AMONG the sayings in the sermon on the mount is the arresting word, "The light of the body is the eye. If therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great that darkness."

John Ruskin says, "Seeing false-ly is worse than blindness. A man who is too dim sighted to discern the road from the ditch, may feel which is which, but if the ditch appears manifestly to him to be the road, and the road to be the ditch, what shall become of him? False seeing is unseeing on the negative side of blindness."

What we see is determined by what we are. That is fully and frankly admitted in art and literature. Lack of capacity is the explanation of the dislike some readers have for the most precious things in color and form and in words. Not to appreciate greatness is to write oneself down as little.

Jesus says it is so in the realm of religion. If the light is darkness it is hopeless. The spirit will look through the medium of the eyes, but if the windows are unclean the vision will be bleared and worse still, the light by which the spirit is illuminated may be dimmed and even quenched. That is the tragedy of life.

Spiritual Optics

It is not possible to see beyond the power of one's capacity. The mean man cannot appreciate generosity. He does not see it and therefore cannot understand. Much of the criticism upon Mark Sabre, in Mr. Hutchinson's "If Winter Comes," came from critics who were unable to appreciate self-sacrifice. It was spontaneous and natural. The criticisms were condemnation, not of the character, but of the writers. We do not recognize that our fate is not in the stars but in ourselves. Southey tells of an escaped nun who, arriving at home and realizing that she was in safety, inquired for a mirror. Perhaps we are so unaccustomed to examine ourselves that we have forgotten what we were like. There is continual need to judge ourselves that we may not be judged.

There is a corporate outlook which characterizes each period of history. Lord Morley says that the attack upon religion in the early Victorian period had a certain gravity, decorum and worthiness of form. Today the attack has other characteristics. The spirit of the times is more than a little morbid. Introspection, self analysis and psycho-analysis are popular. The eye of the soul is turned upon itself. Man is on the dissecting table, and he is surgeon as well as patient.

The love of morbidity is a dangerous affection. It finds expression in the unwholesome probing into sex problems. It devotes its attention, not to the flowers on the branch, but to the manure at the roots. It is the evidence of the darkened vision. Anything that dims the spirit is unwholesome and dangerous.

Tourists at Chamonix sometimes have to wait two or three days for the light in which to see Mt. Blanc. They may be at the very foot of the monarch of the mountains, and see nothing. It is so in the affairs of the spirit; we must wait until the revelation comes. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned.

There is a revelation to little children, to open-eyed wonder that is denied to the wise and the learned. No attainments in education and culture can become substitutes for the purity of heart by which God is seen. Just as there is the right point of view to behold the picture, so there is the condition of spirit in which to discern the things of God.

The founder of Harvard university—Shepherd—used to devote his Saturday afternoons to what he described as getting into the attitude of spirit, that he might face his congregation with the messages from God. We may not rush into the divine presence. We fail to see because of our lack of spiritual capacity resulting from darkening the light we possess.

The disciples of Jesus were described as the light of the world. They may become simply lamp-stands, perfect in form and appearance, but giving forth no illumination. The urgency of the warning is in the fact that there may be the light by which the vision beautiful is discerned, and the far country brought near in all its beauty, and the light may die down so that the flame is only remembered by the ashes that remain. There is nothing more tragic than the experience of those who had the light and rejoiced in it, and through neglect or disobedience allowed it to burn out. They are not lights. They may not be conscious that they have lost their radiance, but they are guilty of the quenched light.

The Unlighted Lamp

There is what Browning calls the sin of the unlit lamp. That is bad, but at least those who commit that sin are saved the remorse that comes with the consciousness of having once possessed the light that has failed. There is no hope for those who deliberately and persistently quench the light. It is sensitive and, as Father Faber says, "A single sin will darken the horizon."

The Chimney Corner

A Seed Cast Into the Ground

BY CRAIG STANTON

A YOUNG man seated in a Pullman car was eating a big red apple. There was a delay of nearly half an hour; the porter opened the doors of the car and let those passengers who wished to, descend and walk about in the woods that paralleled the track. Still eating his apple the young man left the car. "That is the best apple I ever tasted," he said as he finished the last bite and threw the core way. It fell and became partially embedded, he observed, in a mound of soft black earth between a blooming hawthorn and some hazel nut shrubs. The porter called, "All aboard!" The young man reentered the car and continued his journey across the continent. His name was Gail Bradley.

Thirty years later a string of day coaches halted at a station two miles from this spot. The only passengers to alight were a tall, sparse, gray-haired man; a plump, red-cheeked, black-haired woman; and their five children, ranging in age from eighteen years down to six. They were loaded with all sorts of nondescript luggage such as marks the journeyings of the poor and those who travel seldom—two gray canvas telescopes, so full that they no longer telescoped; two brown paper suitcases; pasteboard suit-boxes; a couple of small brown leather satchels and several newspaper packages.

"We'll have to hire a rig to get out to the place," said the man. "You folks wait here and I'll see what can be done."

Just then a farm wagon drawn by two bay horses drove up. The man driving was small and sinewy, his face sunburned to a brick red. He greeted the group on the depot platform with an awkward "How-do" and a bashful grin. After studying the newcomers for a minute he said, "I come for a pump, but I see it ain't here yet. Maybe I could give you folks a lift some place if you don't mind this kind of a kerridge."

"We'd be glad enough of a ride," spoke up the woman. She was quick to jump at any opportunity to save even a penny, for she had had a hard time managing for seven people, and the thought of paying the money to a livery stable for a conveyance to the farm had worried her. "We're going to the old Doolittle farm. Maybe you know it if you've lived around here."

"Sure I know the Doolittle farm—mine's the third beyond it on the Line road. But there ain't nobody living there now. Old Hank Doolittle died awhile back. Heard the place was going to some relations in the East."

"We're the relations—or my wife is," said the man, stepping forward. "Bradley is my name, and this is my wife and our five children. Mr. Henry Doolittle was her uncle and he left the farm to her, so we're turning farmers all of us."

"Ever farm?" asked the farmer as they drove along the dirt road, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley in the seat with him, and children with the luggage on the floor of the wagon.

"No. But my wife was raised on a farm, and with her to direct I thought maybe we could make a go of it. I've been a bookkeeper for a good many years and it takes more than a bookkeeper's salary to raise a family like mine these days. We thought maybe with a farm—pretty well stocked, the lawyer said it was—we could—" The man's voice trailed away as though with weariness and a far-away look came into his eyes.

"Nothing to a life like that in the city, 'specially for kids," said the farmer. "You got a fair farm there in old Doolittle's—that is, fair so far as general farming goes. But I tell you what he's got there ain't anybody else round here got, and I bet you make more off that then off a hull year of bookkeeping. Know anything 'bout apples?"

"Nothing except if I like the taste," said the city man.

"Then let me tell you that you got an orchard of Pearce Reds there that you can't beat the country over. The old man's kept the trees sprayed—four times a year, and you'll have to do the same. Can't get a crop hereabouts unless you spray, though there was a time when you could. And I've heard how he run onto the Pearce graft—everybody in this part of the country knows about his Pearce Red orchard. The fruit buyers come for miles to bid on it. Saw a feller round a day or so ago, but he'll be back."

"Good! What ought I get for them?"

"It's a good apple year, I should say you ought to get a couple of thousand off that orchard. Old Doolittle was lucky. What do you think? He went down to his woods along the railroad track and found a Pearce Red growing there—never planted it nor nothing. Well, that was pure accident. But the rest wasn't, so he deserves all he got from it. He went ahead and grafted and grafted from that Pearce Red until he had a whole orchard of them. Here's your place now. Well, call on me if I can do anything for you. And remember to hold up on the price of those Pearce's—you can get it all right!"

They climbed out of the wagon in front of a faded old rambling house that had once been white but now was a dirty gray.

"Well, we're home, children," said Dora Bradley cheerfully. "Come, father, we'll enter together and then ask a blessing for all the days to come that we spend beneath this roof."

They went through a simple ceremony of petition and gratitude, then established themselves as best they could in the old-fashioned house.

After supper Mr. Bradley took them for a walk. They went down to the woods that skirted the railroad track and at last Gail Bradley stopped before what he had come to see. Between a hawthorn tree and some hazel nut shrubs there rose a gnarled old apple tree, its branches weighted with fragrant red apples. And to the fascinated family he told the story of the apple core of the best apple he had ever eaten.

Intelligence Tests

TESTS of all sorts, from bathing beauty to intelligence, are quite the vogue now. The following is taken from "Parties That Are Different," by Ethel Owen (Abingdon Press). It is one of the features of a "business party."

"Prepare a list of questions and limit to ten minutes the time for answering them. Let each guest exchange his answers with his neighbor for checking up. Present to the person having the greatest number of correct answers a miniature dictionary. Choose questions something like the following:

"What has a face and cannot see? (clock)

"What has legs and cannot walk? (chair)

"What can sing and is not human? (Victrola)

"What has pains and does not ache? (window)

"What cannot talk, yet tells you how you look? (mirror)

"What is time and yet a fruit? (date)

"What is covered, yet is seen? (book)

"What can walk only when worn? (shoes)

"What is often in the hands of the receiver? (telephone)

"What is it that every one must have? (birthdays)"

BOYS and Girls

The Foolish Little Skipping Sari

BY MARGARET T. APPELGARTH

THE foolish little skipping sari did not feel like skipping; it felt more like lying still, and groaning sadly and moaning madly; like sighing drearily and lying wearily. Yet up rose that little sari and—skipped! Of course you know that a sari is only six or seven yards of material draped around the brown body of a little Hindu girl, draped and looped without a single pin or button to hold it in place, so that when the little girl unlooped, the skipping sari unlooped itself like a snake, and there, and the little girl had to keep tucking it up and tucking it up.

It was discouraging, for she had been assured that the white Mem Sahib knew what she was talking about.

No doubt you are wondering what in the world was the matter, so I shall have to tell you that India was the matter. India did not know what to do for the little girl who fell in the fire and burned her knees until they grew so awfully stiff and so painfully covered with sores that the little girl herself could not get all over. India said that the gods must be angry with the small maiden, that evil spirits were inside her, that the only thing to do was to frighten those evil spirits away. So India beat a terrible drum all night long; but the evil spirits seemed to linger. Then India heated red-hot iron, and as if the little girl did not have enough burns already, India burned a new spot to frighten the spirits away. But they did not seem to frighten at all. No, they lingered on and on; and the little girl grew hotter and hotter. India grew desperate and shook the little girl, hoping to shake out the evil spirits. But they would not shake out! India gave her up.

"We have done all we could," sighed India, folding her hands, tired from so much shaking.

"The gods must be very angry with her," sighed her aunts, folding their hands, too.

"She will die," said the uncles.

"She will die," echoed the cousins.

"This was a good deal of trouble to go through for a mere girl, if you ask me!" mumbled her father, who had had to go in the middle of the night to fetch drums from the caste of people who beat drums. He had not enjoyed paying for them, I fear, especially as it seemed to do him the slightest good.

But the little girl's mother never for a moment gave her up. Mothers are like that, even mothers in India.

One pulled her sari close about her face and slipped out of the zenana through various doors and passages

The Explorers' Club

CONDUCTED BY MARGARET T. APPELGARTH

she secretly slipped out of the house itself until she was on the street. She had not been on the street for years—it was forbidden! But what did she remember about forbidden things when that precious little child was full of pain? For she had heard of a woman who chased pain; yes, a woman who laughed at pain and gave it a pill. A white woman, who came from over the sea where they evidently knew things that India did not know. It was true that parts of India did not approve of white women; her own husband, for instance, said that it was all nonsense, that the white woman must be an enormous boaster to think that she could cure things that India could not cure. But the truth was that here and there all over town there were people who had been cured; people whom India had had to give up! There was the woman with the broken back, for instance. What could India do for her? Nothing, of course. Yet that little white Mem Sahib had strapped her up into a regular bundle of white rags until she looked like some stiff log; and by and by—in a month or so—she was as well as anybody else. India could hardly believe its eyes! The whole town buzzed with the news of it; and part of the buzzing leaked into the zenana where the little girl with the burnt knee lay groaning. Nobody altogether believed the story; yet here was the little girl's mother daring to go out on the street in search of that Mem Sahib who chased pain. For perhaps if she could chase away broken backs, she could also chase away burnt knees. Who knew?

Well, our doctor knew! Gladly she put on her pith sun-hat and snatched up her medicine satchel. Gladly she hurried through dusty streets to the zenana where the poor burnt knees were blistering and festering . . .

"Oh, the dear little girl!" she cried when she saw the knees.

"Bring me some hot water at once," she ordered, and set to work on those poor puffy knees, which had not been kept particularly clean or particularly cool or particularly comfortable. When they were beautifully bandaged, with healing salve to ease the pain, the doctor left some pills.

"Take three pills one hour, and skip the next hour," she ordered. Surely that sounded plain enough! So every other hour up rose the weary sari and—skipped. An hour is such a long time to hop-skip-and-jump when your knees are burned and blistered and bandaged. The little girl was completely discouraged because she felt no better.

"Ha! Ha!" sneered her father, "it's no more than I expected. Sheer folly to think a white woman can do what India can't do!"

"The child will die!" said the aunts.

"Die? Of course!" echoed the cousins.

"No! No! No!" sobbed the little brown mother, and once more she pulled her sari over her face and slipped out on the street in search of the white Mem Sahib who chased pain.

"How do you do?" smiled our doctor, "I hope your little girl is much better."

"Oh, Mem Sahib, she gets worse. It is all she can do to skip—"

"Skip?" interrupted the doctor, much puzzled. "Don't you dare let her skip! She must lie perfectly quiet for weeks and weeks!" So then the amazing misunderstanding was explained, and the good doctor once more clapped her sun-hat on her head and hurried to the zenana where the little skipping sari was again trying to get to its feet and skip.

"Oh, my dearest dear," sighed our doctor, "lie right down, and don't budge until I give you the order. For if you do exactly as I say from now on, you can be perfectly well. You really can."

And the little girl believed every word of it. Her father had his doubts, and the aunts and uncles had theirs; but the little girl obeyed all instructions, so that in the course of time off came the bandages, and there were her knees just as brown as they ever had been, just as smooth as they ever had been. For the sheer fun of it, she skipped a little skip to prove that it did not hurt at all. Her father saw her do it; so did her aunts and cousins.

"I am well," she said.

"Yes, you are well!" they agreed.

"Everything the white Mem Sahib said has come true," she announced.

"Yes, everything has come true," they agreed. So the news of her recovery buzzed all over town, just as the news of other such recoveries was buzzing; and on Sunday morning when India heard the Christian converts singing in our Baptist mission chapel, India really could not resist strolling a little nearer to listen. Then because the things our doctor had said about pills and recovery all came true, India decided that maybe what our missionary said about God might be true, also. So India listened, and watched, and waited, and hoped. Indeed, with every new patient who is cured there is a new group of families listening and watching and hoping. Oh, if you and I would only send more doctors and more missionaries, how much quicker India could hear what it seems so hungry to hear!

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topic for September 26

Note: This lesson is the concluding one of the 1925-26 series of the Christian Life Program. A new series begins Oct. 3.

This lesson is based on the seventh chapter of "God's Dynamite" by Lerrigo, pages 143-161.

In meeting have a capable young person read the scripture and then tell graphically of this other prison scene described in the above named chapter. If possible, have someone sing the two phrases only: "Rock of Ages, cleft for me, let me hide myself in thee." These should be sung softly and reverently, without announcement at the end of the description of the second prison scene.

The leader should have on hand a heavy chain and a watch chain, probably tied together with an invisible thread. The subject might be introduced with some such statement as "we are now going to watch a change of chains." Then the leader may go on to tell of how we have sometimes read of the beautiful princess imprisoned in a high tower. The wise prince conceived the idea of putting some butter on a beetle's head, tying a thread to the beetle, a string to the thread, a cord to the string, and a rope to the cord. Thus, the beetle started up the wall of the tower in an endeavor to get the butter which he smelled just ahead, and brought the rope to the princess for her escape.

Then the leader may draw the parallel, showing that just so Judson and Price were imprisoned, and found release through the golden chain of prayer which their wise "King" had sent them.

Further stories from "God's Dynamite" could be brought into the lesson in showing how these prison chains, changed to golden chains, helped to release many a "captive in sin and ignorance." An earnest prayer for the Karens, and for the opening of the eyes of young people today, might be the conclusion of this lesson.

Kansas Assembly, 1926

BY JOANNA DREWS

Ottawa—an Indian name for one of the oldest and prettiest towns of the sunflower state; a town around which is woven many beautiful Indian legends and stories; a town on the Marais de Cygeus river, and famous for its beautiful old homes, for its smooth green lawns and for its stately elms. But to Kansas Baptists the town means more than this, for Ottawa is the site of Ottawa university, our Baptist college. It is on the elm-shaded campus that Kansas Baptists hold their annual state assembly.

Not only in numbers was the assembly this year unusual, but never before has there been such interest, such enthusiasm and such genuine Christian spirit and fellowship.

From every part of the state delegates came. Some traveled in cars and some in "would-be cars." The registration tables were swamped. Whole families arrived, young people, old people, tall people, short people, fat people, slender people—all kinds of people. But all were comfortably located and cared for in a short time. Many were detailed to boarding clubs; others pitched tents and proceeded to enjoy camping out.

The whole second floor of the gymnasium with rows and rows of beds was the scene of a house party for World Wide Guild girls.

On the south side of the campus was Camp Tavy Jones with its rows of orderly, neat tents, a real camp for real boys. Each tent was provided with a trained leader and there were camp regulations, class instructions, inspection, stunts, drills, games, contests—everything that a real camp should have. This camp stressed the four-fold life and emphasized the building of Christian character. That it served this purpose was evidenced by the manner in which the boys responded to invitations for Christian service and the voluntary part they took in prayers and devotions.

In addition, there were classes in methods and doctrines, in young people's work, in teacher training, in W. W. G. work and missions, in pageantry and story telling. Even the ministers and women had classes, all led by well-equipped, competent leaders. There was also a nursery for the wee folk.

Just before noon, the assembly fairly "raised the roof" with yells and songs. Even those with shiny heads forgot both age and dignity to join in on the chorus. There was a spirit of friendly rivalry between various delegations. How we rushed to the clubs to see if every one was there, and if by chance we should have a nice fat letter from home.

In the afternoon there were sports of all kinds for those who felt inclined, and for those who did not, the afternoon was given to writing letters, strolling around the campus enjoying new friends and old. Many clever, entertaining and worth while stunts were put on by various delegations, and an award made for the best song.

Vespers—shall we ever forget them? One of the prettiest pictures of the day was to see the great crowd sitting on the grassy slope of the campus, just as the sun sank over the horizon. How near God seemed; how the music, prayers, and inspiration of the messages opened our hearts to a new and greater vision of him, of love, of service.

After vespers, we adjourned to the chapel room where the evening address on some phase of assembly work was given. An invitation for Life Service decisions was responded to by a large number of young people, some of whom dedicated their lives to Christian service in the ministry or in foreign fields.

The total number of registration was 1032, of which 117 were in the World Wide Guild house party and eighty-six in the boys' camp.

At the close of the assembly all departed to their various churches over the state carrying with them enthusiasm, a new conception of Christian service, and experience gained from being on the mountain peak, with a resolution to keep the home fires burning in their own local churches.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Nissim Tager, traveler, reports the discovery of a tribe of Jews in central Arabia. They are regular Bedouin cattle-men and warriors and supporters of Ibn Saud who now rules in Arabia. They have an ancient scroll of the law and observe the Jewish rites.

Howard university, for negroes, has broken with its past by electing a negro, Bishop John A. Gregg to its presidency. Fisk university has elected a white president, Dr. Thomas Elsa Jones, and is in quest of $1,000,000 for endowment.

The Presbyterian of the South in its editorial columns proposes on the grounds of morals, economics and psychology that the United States cancel unconditionally every one of the war debts due to this nation from European countries.

Significant of the new order of corporate business is the announcement that a $50,000,000 group insurance program to cover its 36,000 employes has been announced by Swift and Co., packers. The insurance is for members of the employes' benefit association, an organization long in force for Swift and Co.'s workers. Weekly sums are contributed for protection in varying amounts. The group insurance will be in addition to other insurance features incorporated at present in the benefit association plan. Under terms of the plan life insurance is offered in amounts from $1000 to $10,000, dependent upon the salary of the individuals insured.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

KEEPING THE FUNDAMENTALS IN MIND

It is never wise to take for granted that the fundamental facts about Baptist missions are well known to the average Baptist congregation. It is probable that only a few members in each church are well informed on the subject of missions, and for this reason it is necessary that every pastor equip himself with a thorough knowledge of the scope, method of financing, needs and achievements of Baptist missions. He should have this information not only to enable him to answer any questions which may be put to him but also that he may continually keep the missionary motive alive in his church.

Rev. Homer F. Yale, of the Whitney Point church in New York state, has prepared an excellent summary of the leading facts about Baptist missions which can be used as the outline of a sermon or lecture or for reference by any one who wishes a general statement about our missionary work. The material has been taken from the various reports of the boards, and from literature published by the Board of Missionary Cooperation.

In five concise pages, this resumé gives the salient facts about the composition of the Northern Baptist Convention, the major organizations, the general plan of financing missionary work, and the chief pieces of missionary literature. The ten foreign fields are named and the number of missionaries and native workers engaged on them, the types of missionary institutions and the work done there, as well as the number of baptisms during the past year. The fields and work of the two home mission societies are also covered, and the Christian center and the work of the colporteur explained. The article concludes with a brief statement about Baptist schools and colleges, and the work of the state conventions and city mission societies.

When a pastor has these facts at his fingertips, it is a safe prediction that his church will take a real and active interest in missions.

A SPECIAL HONOR LIST

The Ohio Baptist for Aug. 12 calls attention to a Baptist church in Miami, Florida, which contributed, during the last quarter, nearly $2000 more for missions than for current expenses, and inquires whether there are any Ohio churches which can match this record. "We want to publish a list of Ohio Baptist churches," the paper continues, "which contribute more for missions than current expenses. If your church is entitled to be in this class, send us the facts."

It would be interesting to publish a similar list for the entire Northern Convention. Such an honor roll would be a distinguished company indeed.

$34,000 Per Year or $2,833.33 Per Month

IF EVERY CHURCH WILL DO ITS PART OUR CONVENTION WILL MEET ITS GOAL

Suggestions

- 1-That every local church accept a quota which will represent its interest in our State and National Missionary enterprise. This quota ought to be not less than $5.00 per member.
- 2-That every local church put on an Every Member Plan program which will secure pledges enough to insure payment of the quota.
- 3-That money so pledged be collected and forwarded on the basis of one-twelfth of the year's quota each month.

EAST WASHINGTON'S

NEW POSTER

This is a picture of the poster which has been issued by the state convention office of East Washington and North Idaho. At the top is printed the state goal for the year and month, and the local church goals for the year and month appear below. The three major aims for the year, as outlined in the 1926 report of the Board of Missionary Cooperation, are set in smaller type in the center of the poster.

Beneath is a section where the church can show its financial record from month to month. Two horizontal oblongs are labelled—one, "Current Expenses" and the other, "Missions," and are divided vertically into the twelve months. Provision is made for the local church to enter three amounts in each section every month—the amount due at the time, the amount paid at the time, and the balance unpaid.

A number of the state conventions have issued posters of a similar nature, and the churches are finding them useful in keeping the matter of quota payments constantly before their congregations. In some states where the convention office has not issued a poster, several churches have made their own.

Among Ourselves

Nebraska Letter

By R. R. COON

IN Horace a council met Aug. 28 for the ordination of J. A. Whitman, pastor of the church. C. H. Lindburg acted as moderator. The state secretary, H. L. Morton, preached the sermon; Rev. Frank Bock of Loup City gave the charge to the candidate; Rev. C. H. Skinner of Polk, the charge to the church; and Rev. F. W. Johnson of Central City offered the ordaining prayer. The community of Horace has waited long for a resident pastor. Mr. Whitman will be the only pastor in a large community.

Rev. A. C. Downing leaves Tilden to become pastor at Wayne.—The church at Doane has called Rev. H. J. Hickman of Selden, Kan. This will be his second pastorate at Doane.—Rev. J. A. San De Fur, pastor at David City, conducted the only daily vacation Bible school in the city, all denominations joining successfully in the enterprise.—The Scotts Bluff church under the leadership of Pastor Bukoutz, became self-supporting Aug. 1.—At Dannebrog a reception was given Rev. and Mrs. Nutinon who leave soon to engage in missionary work in Africa.—Rev. Roy Lewis has become pastor at Columbus. In 1912, when some of us were returning from the convention in Wayne, we stopped at Columbus and held a prayer meeting in the deserted church. Some of the members consented to have the traveling minister preach the next Sunday and this method continued for a year. Later, pastors were called, Rev. Pile, the last one, remaining several years. Columbus has grown into a flourishing parish.—Rev. J. S. Umberger leaves York for Kansas City, Mo., where he will engage in evangelistic work.

The Assembly

The Nebraska assembly met Aug. 9-17 at Grand Island. The registered attendance was 168 but many others were present for one or more sessions. The faculty numbered twenty; Rev. Ezra Duncan, director of religious education, was dean of the assembly. Several instructors were from other states: Dr. W. T. Elmore, Eastern Theological seminary, Philadelphia; Rev. Milton M. McGorrill, Chicago; Bliss Mapes, Bishop's college; Rev. E. W. Thornton, missionary to the Philippines; Mrs. H. B. Marshall, Huron college; Miss Myrtle Huckelberry, Indiana State Convention, and Mrs. Elizabeth Finn, director of young people's work, Publication Society. A variety of studies and lectures was offered, including a special program given for the children. About twenty pastors were present.

The new auditorium-gymnasium was dedicated Sunday, Aug. 15. This is a solid and ornamental brick building, one of the best of its kind in the state. The audience room is fifty-five by eighty-six feet with a platform at one side and a gallery at the other. The complete cost with furnishings will be $56,000. About $27,000 has already been subscribed. $1550 was received in pledges and cash at the Sunday services.

A Modern "Pauline" Tour

By CHARLES F. LEEK

A MODERN "Pauline" tour of Europe for the purpose of strengthening the brethren and building up the churches will start Sept. 1 when Dr. Edgar Y. Mullins, president of the Southern Baptist Theological seminary, as president of the Baptist World Alliance, sails from New York for Barcelona. He will be joined "over there" by four "companions in travel" who will accompany him to eleven regional conferences to which Baptists of twenty-five nations will send messengers.

Beginning at Barcelona on Sept. 10, the Mullins party will consist of Doctor Mullins, Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke, secretary of the alliance, Dr. Everett Gill, Dr. W. O. Lewis, the latter two being American Baptists, and Dr. M. E. Aubrey, the representative of the British Baptists. Mr. George W. Norton, Jr., treasurer of the Southern Baptist Convention, will join the travelers before they enter Russia and will accompany them on a part of the remainder of the tour.

At the Barcelona conference there will be sixteen native speakers besides the five visitors. A similar plan will be followed at the other conferences. Belgium, France, Italy, Spain and Portugal will be represented.

From Barcelona the travelers will go overland to Budapest where messengers from Austria, Bulgaria, Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, Jugo-Slavia, and Roumania will gather. Then they will turn north for a meeting of Poland Baptists at Lodz, followed by a conference still further northeast at Moscow which will deal with the Russian situation. At Budapest Doctor Mullins and party will participate in the dedication of the new Baptist seminary. Each of the above conferences will last four days.

Then the party will proceed due west to Riga on the Baltic sea to meet Baptist representatives from Finland, Esthonia, Latvia and Lithuania. At the close of a three-day conference here a southwesterly course will be taken across Germany for three two-day conferences at Konigsberg, Berlin, and Gelsenkirchen. At the latter conference the Baptists of Holland and Switzerland will also be present. Another four-day meeting is planned to follow at Copenhagen with Baptists of Denmark, Finland, Sweden and Norway in attendance.

The final meetings will be held at London and Aberdeen, Scotland. At London, Baptists plan to honor Doctor Mullins at a rally and at a dinner at which David Lloyd George will preside.

Dr. A. T. Robertson, professor of New Testament interpretation, will be acting president of the seminary at Louisville in the absence of Doctor Mullins.

A New Project in Student Ministry

By FORREST E. WITCRAFT

A PROJECT inaugurated last year by the student body of the divinity school of the University of Chicago bids fair to become a permanent and significant part of its activity. A group of divinity students became convinced that an uncultivated field for service lies in the possibility of definite contacts between the divinity school and our colleges and universities. An opportunity for a team of future religious leaders to visit a college, present, as students, their understanding of the deeper meaning of life, and discuss problems of common significance, ought to be valuable to all concerned.

Accordingly a committee under the student council was set up to work out a plan. The matter was first broached to the administration of two of our colleges by Prof. C. T. Holman of the divinity school. The idea was approved by both President Spencer of Hillsdale college, and President Hoben of Kalamazoo college, and was referred to the student bodies of these schools, who sent invitations to the students of the divinity school for deputations to visit their campuses. Each school was then visited by a representative of the divinity students, who undertook to make personal contacts, form some idea of the

A Prayer for Labor Day

By ARTHUR E. COWLEY

"Give us this day our daily bread"

LORD, when we pray for daily bread
Teach us the meaning of our prayer,
Lest, selfish, we unthinking ask
Thee and the world our need to bear.

Help us to see that daily bread
Is sent by thee through human hands;
That brother's life must spend itself
If thou wouldst answer our demands.

Show us our prayer cannot avail
If we are blind to earth's great wrongs.
Which daily bread deny to men
To whom, thou knowest, it belongs.

Forbid, O Master, we should seek
To take from thee our daily bread,
Unless another's need we see
And strive to care for those unfed.

Then shall we, too, with thee, O Lord,
Unite to answer this our prayer,
And hasten brotherhood's glad day
When all our daily bread shall share.

local situation, and set up a program for the visit of the team two weeks later, very effort being made to meet the students on a common basis and to let them indicate just what they thought ought to be done.

Three students, one woman and two men, spent two days at Hillsdale. One of the most interesting and valuable phases of the program there was the opportunity to get into regular class sessions through the courtesy of various instructors. Fifteen classes, in such departments as sociology, psychology, education, Bible, and economics, were opened to the visitors and discussions were held. Opportunity was afforded for a presentation to all the students at chapel period, and two other open meetings were held. There were several conferences with groups of students, religious leaders, Y. M. C. A. and W. C. A. cabinets, etc., and personal interviews on individual problems and occasional questions. The team was entertained by the students and felt that they succeeded in dispelling the invisible veil of constraint which often separates students and older leaders.

The visit to Kalamazoo was different in nature, but adapted to the local situation. Six students, three men and three women, spent their first evening there addressing the six literary societies which include most of the students. Numerous discussions and interviews followed. The next day was spent wholly in personal interviews, in an attempt to accomplish a double purpose, to talk with students who had problems which they wished to discuss, and to make a survey of the college situation in general. A report of this second day's work was written by the team, and submitted to the student body at Kalamazoo.

Results

The results hoped for from such an effort have been indicated by the student council's committee as follows: A deeper understanding on the part of the college students as to the real meaning and scope of religion. A more constructive cooperation on the part of college men and women in the religious enterprise. An incentive toward the choosing religious leadership as a life work by those who are qualified. An intimate knowledge on the part of the divinity group as to how young men and women in the colleges are thinking about life, religion, vocation, and the church. Four phases of the plan as it is being experimentally worked out seem to be valuable: The scheme is never forced upon a school. An invitation must come from the student body itself, with the official support of the college administration. The actual program is determined by the local situation, and is worked out by a divinity representative on the field in cooperation with the college student leaders. The divinity students do not act as professional leaders, but make every effort to come as students to students. Large groups and set speeches are reduced to a minimum and emphasis is placed upon smaller, natural groups and personal contacts.

The Task

By LILLIE J. WATKINS

WHAT is our task, your responsibility and mine? To give money to support the missionary, our representative on the field taking the place of Christ in giving his message of love. Have we done it as unto him? To keep ourselves intelligently informed of the master's business, with an interest that comes from partnership. Have we read Missions every month and the study books? To show a friendly spirit to the foreigner, and a personal interest in our missionaries. How many have a foreign friend? How many have brought cheer to a missionary? To pray fervently each day for the power of God to reach the women in our churches, not interested in missions, who are sadly hindering the coming of Christ's kingdom by their lack of support and interest; for strength and wisdom for our missionaries who need our prayers; and for ourselves that He may use us for His glory.

When we speak in general terms of cutting the budget it means very little to the rank and file in our churches, but when we visualize the cuts by saying that seventy-six missionaries and thirty-six missionary teachers under the appointment of the Women's American Baptist Home Mission Society have actually been taken from the fields, in the last five years, and that station after station has been discontinued, it comes with startling force.

Two of the large groups greatly affected by the reduced budgets are the negroes and the Mexicans. From our study of the negroes in recent years, we have learned of the race consciousness that is growing up among them, and the imperative need for cooperation and sympathetic understanding on the part of both white and negro people, in an effort for better race relations. In the face of all this, when perhaps our help is needed to a greater extent than ever in the past, it has been necessary for us to discontinue one after another of the missionaries among the negroes, until it has resulted in withdrawing, practically, from all the missionary work in the South. In the North where the negroes have gathered in such large numbers, in the years during and following the war, the reductions have been felt keenly. Just one example. Because of the inability of our Home Mission society to provide properly for the work at Morgan community house, Pittsburgh, Pa., the missionaries have been withdrawn and the work turned over to another denomination. We had a work well established in this Christian center, with a well-equipped negro woman as leader, in one of the most needy fields among the negroes, and it is a great calamity that the work could not be continued under our Baptist denomination.

From fourteen southern schools, among the negroes, our entire appropriation has been discontinued, leaving only seven schools among these people where we have teachers, and in all these there has been a reduction of 25 per cent or more.

Mexicans, during the past years, have been coming in large numbers over the border into the United States. These people have been held in the bondage of ignorance, superstition and oppression through many centuries. Their coming to us brings with it not only enlarged opportunities for service but a responsibility to bring to these people, who are in darkness, a knowledge of Jesus Christ, the Light of the World. The reductions in our budget have not only made it impossible for us to take advantage of these new opportunities and meet these new responsibilities, but it has been necessary to discontinue work among these people that has been well started. It is with aching hearts that we record: Mexican work discontinued in Yuma and Tucson, Ariz., in San Diego and Santa Barbara, Calif.

If these Spanish-speaking people, sojourning in our country for a time, should return to their native land taking with them the gospel message, it might mean a revitalized Mexico.

In Porto Rico, where the need is so great and the people eager to hear, two workers have had to be taken from the field when we should be adding to the number of workers in order to meet the situation. When Miss Huber was here she told us that the church, which has a seating capacity of 200, was filled to overflowing on Sunday evenings, with 500 or 600 people in attendance, and that the church members gave up the seats to the unconverted people; that the Sunday school was so overcrowded the children met in the gardens of the neighbors, and in the midst of these gardens, the seed was sown in the hearts of the little children. The missionaries had to request the children not to bring others, because there was no room. She told the story of a little three-year-old girl who went home from Sunday school and all day was going about saying, "God is love, God is love." The next day the mother went to one of the native missionaries and asked "Who is this God, and what do you mean when you say 'God is love'?" The missionary explained to her, and the mother has been coming regularly. We have this spring several young women graduating from our training school in Porto Rico, equipped to take up the missionary work among their own people, and the people hungrily waiting for the word, but there is no money to provide the salaries of these young women? Isn't it a tragedy? God has so wonderfully blessed the service of our missionaries in that island, and now when the opportunities for ingathering are so great, we cannot go forward in the work, because of lack of funds!

We think of our country as Christian and yet we are told there is a Buddhist temple in every large city on the Pacific coast. In San Pedro, there is gathered in a Sunday school more than 300 Japanese children. Upon inquiry, we find that the parents of these children are largely Buddhist. When the missionary visits in the home, the parents say, "We are too old to learn the new way, but we want our children to learn it!" What an opportunity among these Japanese children, and yet we can have only one missionary there, where there is work for two or three, and when the request came for cooperation in a Christian center in that city, among the Japanese, we had to say we could not do it, because we did not have the money!

God will surely hold us accountable for all these opportunities, right here in our own country, to help bring "Christ in Every Home," which we are failing to meet because there are so many of us who are not interested in the things of the kingdom.

One more thing we must not forget and that is the missionary who is left alone on a field when her companions have been removed because there is not money for their salaries. It means all the work and strain of trying to carry on a work that two or three people have been previously carrying, and in more than one case it has meant the breaking down of the health of the missionary left in charge.

Because the money has not been paid into the treasury as it should be by the churches during the year, our society has found it necessary to borrow from the banks more than $100,000, on which we have paid more than $4000 interest. This amount would have paid the salaries of four workers on the mission field, for a year!

This is but a small part of a long, sad tale of the "cuts" in the budget of our Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society.

Why this heartbreaking, humiliating condition? Who has been unfaithful? What churches have failed to meet their apportionments?

In our handbook we have reported 49,208 women in New England belonging to churches, and only 17,194 active in missions. Is not this the answer? The loss of over 32,000 women in New England accepting Christ as their Saviour and Lord yet not interested in the one great passion of their Leader—the revealing of the love of God to those who know him not.

Is not our task this coming year to work persistently, tactfully, and prayerfully to reach these 32,000 women, members of Christ's church who are not forwarding his commission to bring peace and righteousness in this world—and enable them to catch a vision of our self-sacrificing Saviour and His love for the sin-sick world, till the joy of their life is in fellowship with their Lord in bringing Christ into every home.

Building for God in Bassein

By C. A. NICHOLS

ANY report of work covering a long period of time must take into account conditions, with their assets and liabilities, of which the work is an outgrowth. Outstanding among the conditions of twenty-five years ago were the habits of assuming and discharging responsibility which our people had. They had already acquired the habit, to a large extent, of coordinated effort; had raised a fair endowment for the school, which was invested through the mission society in America; had raised more and invested it in a successful mill property; had erected all their school buildings from their own resources, and had carried on schools in their towns and jungle villages, without aid from America.

Among the outstanding, easily recognizable achievements of the Sgau Karens during the past quarter-century are buildings which have been erected and their equipment, the total cost between eight and nine lacs of rupees. Our people are still building, adding to the group which contains some of the best school edifices in India. They have just undertaken the building of a new pipe organ for our chapel, which will cost, when complete, over Rs. 40,000, and which they will build, of course, without allowing their other work to suffer. Thus they are making progress in learning their own ability to work, not only with each other, but with God, who has strengthened them in a truly wonderful manner, providing their equipment for future service in the extension of his kingdom. This organ is to be made by one of the best manufacturers in Great Britain, who built the organ in Westminster abbey and many other of the best instruments in different parts of the world.

I feared when we began our largest building undertaking that this extra business might hinder our "spiritual" work, but the opposite result has been manifested. There is the case of a whole family of seven persons who came down to the dedication. The man is head of his non-Christian village and had resisted the gospel for over twenty years, but he returned to his village saying that he had "seen Christ" here, which we can easily understand when we visualize the beautiful buildings, finely illuminated by our own electric light plant; the happy thousands, working in delightful harmony; the inspiring music, vocal and instrumental; and the entire buoyant atmosphere. The whole family has been baptized and its members have been living happy and exemplary Christian lives ever since.

One of our preachers who has been working for thirty-four years among the Kachins, tells us that away to the farthest northern limit of the work, among the wild peoples, the story of the building has penetrated with great effect through reports carried by Kachin boys and other visitors to our recent convention meetings held in Bassein. The effect is shown in this question: "They, as well as we, were ignorant mountaineers and spirit worshippers; and if they can, why can not we?" The fact that our people are able to cooperate to this extent witnesses forcibly and favorably upon the non-Christian communities in all parts of the province. People the world over are now looking for and demanding the best, and certainly what we do and give in the name of God and for the extension of his kingdom should be the best. Only a few days since a young man of seventeen whose father, a pastor, had been killed through treachery, and who stays at home to work in the fields and support his mother and four younger brothers and sisters who are in school, stood up in church and said that he had just given me Rs. 10 and had agreed to give enough more to make up Rs. 150, towards the new organ, and that his uncle would give enough more to bring the total up to Rs. 200, because he was sure "that the instrument would preach the gospel to those from near and far" when they heard it. In their fellowship service, our pastors and leaders and the entire Christian constituency have learned to love one another and to work with one another with a divine joy never before experienced, a fact to which we can most truly bear witness.

The assistant who used to travel with me said, "When we first started out to solicit funds for our building operations, I did not know where I was to find a suitable text from which to preach on the subject, but now I find that the Bible from cover to cover is all 'giving' or 'permanent building'; we ask our people to 'give' and God is always 'giving,' even giving himself up to death in our behalf."

But it is sometimes asked, have we not pressed too hard in raising these amounts of money from a confessedly poor people? Such has not been the case. Almost all, if not quite all, of our people have their domestic animals, the most common being pigs. A full grown pig will sell for Rs. 40 or more and we have church membership of 15,260. During the five years and more of our recent building operations, the price of one pig per individual would more than make up the full amount expended for the erection and equipment of the entire group of buildings. One church of only about 100 members contributed over Rs. 11,000 to the fund and the church as a whole says that it has not in the least become poorer, but, on the contrary, has bettered its financial condition. One man among them contributed Rs. 1000, notwithstanding the fact that he owed Rs. 500 and was paying a very high rate of interest which he had found it almost impossible to raise from year to year; but when he undertook to raise the amount of his pledge, after making it a matter of earnest prayer, he sold his crops and paid his subscription in full, not only that but also paid his debt, interest and principal, and had Rs. 650 left to carry him through the year. Recently one of our pastors, whose church among the poorest, came in and shook my hand heartily and handed me Rs.

1000 toward the cost of the new organ, saying, "You asked us to pay a rupee each for the first installment, and then two rupees for another and then still later, another rupee each, but I do not like that fiddling way of doing things, so we got up and arranged to pay the whole thing in a lump sum and be done with it." These incidents give us a peep into significant expressions of our people's attitude about what they regard, with a very clear far-sightedness, as the meaning of "working with God."

Our task throughout the twenty-five years has, of course, included many anxieties, imperfections and mistakes, but it has been a term of joy and fellowship for which to be greatly thankful: a goodly number of people taking God's word at full value and trying together to work it out in actual experience, in obedience to his will, and with a minimum of doubt. May they never do otherwise. Of course this does not mean that they have "already attained," but this is undeniably the trend of the great body of their leaders, as well as of those who are led.

COMPLETELY NEW SUBURBAN HOME

New Books

When the Morning Wakens, by Rev. Malcolm James MacLeod, D.D., minister, Collegiate church of St. Nicholas, New York City. New York: Doran, $2.

A volume of sixteen sermons by the pastor of the oldest church in America who has been serving this church for sixteen years. Some years ago he wrote a volume of sermons entitled "Songs in the Night;" this is a companion volume, giving a picture of the triumphant morning. It is a gold mine for the preacher. It will also bring a blessing to all those devout souls seeking light, inspiration and encouragement on the way that leads to God.

—A. H. BAILEY.

The Silent Six, by Austin J. Small, New York: Doran, $2.

The nubbin of the story: six criminally depraved men combine by a cast-iron pact that all the earnings of their crimes be equally divided among them; if one is caught he must not give away any of his pals but must bear the punishment alone on the gallows or in the prison; while he is in prison his fellow-criminals must share with him the revenues of their crimes and care for his wife and children as for their own until his release or after he perishes on the gallows. To betray or "squeal" on a pal is an unforgivable offense.

Damon Grey is one of the arch-villains. He is unjustly convicted of the crime of a pal but will not defend himself by exposing the real murderer. He is immured in the penitentiary for eight years. When he is released he seeks his girl wife whom he has loved with all the ardor of his soul. He discovers that she was neglected by his confederates and died in a charity house at the birth of her child after suffering the hardships of starvation in its worst form. The child survived and was adopted into a wealthy home while the mother was buried in the "potter's field." Damon Grey swears eternal vengeance on the "Silent Five" who so mistreated his wife. He proceeds to execute their doom. The five die by a horrid death from some illusive malady undetected by any post mortem examination. When about to slay his unrecognized daughter by the same poison, through an accident he falls victim of the trap he prepared for her. The "Silent Six" are wiped out of life. There the tale ends.

The literature of the book is choice for its style and phraseology. The evolution of the plot is subtle and has a weird fascination. It ferments with lawlessness, hatred, revenge, remorse (never repentance), and murder. A slight thread of devoted love is visible here and there. It is entirely free from any forbidding sentiment in expression or spirit. We look in vain for any objective to the ghastly recital of human depravity beyond ministering to the taste of those who are prurient for the weird and horrible. 'Tis an offering on the altar of Nemesis whose fumes must be sweet to her nostrils.

The World's Best Proverbs and Maxims, by J. Gilchrist Lawson. New York: Doran, $2 net.

A book that gives in one volume the cream of the world's best proverbs and maxims, with quality rather than quantity as the objective in the selection—though the quantity is there as well, as the quotations cover nearly 400 pages. A handy book for any one to have, but especially for the writer or public speaker.

—E. C. GEORGE.

The Genesis of the World War, by Harry Elmer Barnes. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, $3.50.

Who is morally responsible for the war? If the blame does not rest squarely on the shoulders of Germany, a great international crime has been committed by the nations that signed the treaty of Versailles, and the United States as an insistent beneficiary of that treaty is a party to the crime. He who ventures to challenge that treaty on the ground that the victors were guilty of bringing on the war assumes a serious responsibility. When John Kenneth Turner boldly indicted the victor nations four years ago, in his book, "Shall It Be Again?" he was rather contemptuously dismissed as a radical. But here comes Professor Barnes, teacher of historical sociology in Smith college, university fellow and writer of note on foreign affairs, with documentary evidence that must be faced. Consider one allegation: By agreement between Poincare and Izvolski a group of leading French papers received enormous bribes in 1912-13 from Russia to promote the election of Poincare as president of France, and to incite French public sentiment against Germany and Austria, in preparation for a war which by mutual agreement Russia was to undertake for the possession of Constantinople. Consider also the quotation from a letter written by Colonel House to President Wilson May 29, 1914, two months before the war: "Whenever England consents, France and Russia will close in on Germany and Austria." The book is packed with such material. And nothing has been written lightly. Almost every proposition has already been publicly challenged and hammered into firmness by hard debate. And everything seems to be supported with scientific precision by documents of the most definite character. The analysis makes a bid for acceptance that can be set aside only by the most thorough and definite contradictory evidence.

A personal record of a living of positive gospel—with emphasis upon the "dos" of life rather than upon the "don'ts." The motif of the book may be taken from the author's own words in his foreword: "Let us take life then as God's gift; and as we progress daily a more perfect expression of freedom from all that would wrongfully enthrall us, let us seek diligently to 'let our light shine' upon those around who seem to be living in the shadows."

The Local Church: Its Present and Future, by Frederick A. Agar. New York: Revell, $1.

Doctor Agar has gathered together his convictions as to the changes that should take place in the local church so that it is to function in the present as it should, and contribute its best to the future. The fruit of his long experience and wide observation is to be found on each page. His conclusions, if adopted, would go far toward a reconstruction of the church along lines of aggressive efficiency. The subjects treated are: "Justifying Continuance," "The Strength of a Church," "The Weakness of a Church," "The Minister," "Its Finances," "The Objectives of Its Program" and "Building the Future Program." The last chapter is well worth the price of the book.

"Good evening. Surely. All evenings are good evenings. How about a few riddles this evening? Fine, fine. Let's go. What is your answer to this one?"

"A subscriber discontinues his paper saying his wife has just paid $15 for a new fall hat. Question: indicate the alibi (1) subscriber, (2) his wife, (3) minus $5, (4) the paper or (5) the hat. Is there any relation between a hat and what under the hat?"

"Maybe so. A bishop who was also a Mason had just attended a number of cornerstone-laying exercises. Then he was present at an ordination of a bald brother. He dozed while the prayer of ordination was being offered. Awakening with the 'Amen,' he laid his hand absent-mindedly on the shining pate and said solemnly, 'I now declare this stone duly and regularly laid.'"

"What is the difference," asked the troubled deacon, 'between the man who says he cannot afford to take the denominational periodicals and the non-affiliated Baptist who cannot unite with the local church because of the dear old church book —, etc?' To which the gentle cynic replied: 'There is no difference. They are both I——.' Fill in dashes and complete the last word.

"What ails the man," asks the provoked pastor, 'who almost sheds tears as he reads me he cannot get interested in THE BAPTIST, but that when he used to take the —, now defunct, he used to read everything in it every week, including the patent medicine advertisements and all the wonderful obituaries?' Indeed! How interesting! What makes you think so?"

"The battle is lost," said one of Napoleon's marshals. 'It is only three o'clock,' replied the famous fighter, 'and we have yet fully three hours of daylight to win our victory.' And they did it. There are always a few tired people in every church who are ready to quit. Why not allow them to die in peace and concentrate on the young, enthusiastic and unharnessed individuals? For winning a victory leaders do not waste much time patching up the maimed, the halt and the blind and those eternally tired folks that clutter up the highroads, but they swing into line the new recruits fresh from training camps. All of which is parable. Read it again.

"Gertrude Ederle swam the channel and is acclaimed the world's greatest woman swimmer because she refused to give up and get into the tug when the buffeting waves and tides were apparently insuperable. When others shouted, 'Quit and come in,' she replied, 'What for?' Trudie could tell some pastors and agents for THE BAPTIST quite a number of things. But of course she was only a swimmer, not a woman at that.

"Here is a brand new riddle: 'My baby is fifteen months old. When she was eight months old she cut seven teeth but since then she hasn't cut any. What do you advise?' The following letter was received from a pastor: 'Three years ago your church took twenty copies of THE BAPTIST. Since then the list has not increased any. What do you advise?' We sent the same reply given by the doctor to the baby: 'Feed plenty of fresh whole milk and keep in the sunshine.' What would you have said?"

"A negro pastor announced: 'De choir will now sing, "I'm glad salvation's here," while Deacon Ketcham passes de hat. De congregation will please remember while salvation am free, we hab to pay de choir foh singing' about it. You all please contribute accordin' to yo' means, an' not accordin' to yo' meanness.' Negroes have a fine sense of humor. Humor works when logic fails.

"If the Apostle Paul were living today he doubtless would be a Baptist leader in missionary tasks and would write the churches: 'On the first day of the year every one lay by him an annual subscription to THE BAPTIST and Missions, the Lord hath prospered him, for the Lord loveth a hilarious subscriber.' These essential periodicals may always be had at $3 per year for both. Send cash for renewal or new subscription.

"WCOY now signs off. Write us your troubles. We haven't any."

July 23. He taught the home mission textbook, "Our Templed Hills," at the Oregon and West Washington assemblies and in August served as supply pastor at the Salem church during the pastor's vacation.

JUNE 1, 1921, A SUNDAY SCHOOL was organized in the McDoel public school building by Rev. R. C. Speer and assistants from the First Baptist church, Bloomington, Ind. In the fall of that year, property was purchased through the aid of the state convention to house the growing organization. In April, 1922, a tabernacle was erected on the rear of the lot. A successful meeting was held by Rev. R. C. Speer and Rev. W. E. Houghton, colporter for the American Baptist Publication Society. Apr. 30, 1922, the sixty-two members joining during those meetings were constituted a branch of the First church. Aug. 27, 1922, William Binkley, member of the First church, was licensed to preach and given specific charge of the new mission. He has been its pastor ever since. Since Rev. C. B. Stephens has become pastor of First church lots have been bought on the Dixie highway, three blocks from the former site. The following year the church voted to erect a suitable building to house its growing needs. The corner stone was laid November, 1925, and on June 13, 1926, the dedication services marked a new milestone in the growth and life of one of the most vitally alive young churches in Indiana. The all-day services included an address by Rev. C. M. Dinsmore, dedication sermon by Rev. R. C. Speer, of Tabernacle church, Milwaukee, sermon by Rev. C. G. Morse of the Indiana Baptist Convention. The balance of the amount needed to pay for the church building was raised, amounting to $5000. The services were concluded in the evening when Rev. C. B. Stephens of First church dedicated the new baptistry by the baptism of two young people.

INSTEAD OF LETTING DOWN for the vacation season, Pastor R. S. Beal of First church, Tucson, Ariz., warmed up to a series of midsummer sermons on the second coming of Christ and had crowds to hear him.

THE MID-YEAR BULLETIN of the First church, Beaumont, Tex., resembles the annual report of a great business corporation in the range and complexity of activities exhibited. Among other things it shows that the new house cost $320,000, of which $195,000 is paid and the rest covered by a ten-year loan.

FULTON HEIGHTS CHURCH, North Medford, Mass., was the scene of a double wedding—Miss Lillian Maud Keddy to Dr. James Murray Gavel, and Miss Lucy Isabella Wishman to Clarence Scott. Rev. John Shade Franklin officiated.

EVANGELIST DAVID NYGREN of Chicago supplied the pulpit of the Swedish Baptist church, Sioux City, Iowa, during the summer months.

GIDEONS SUPPLIED THE PULPIT of Woodlawn church, Chicago, Aug. 22.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for September 11

GIFTS FOR THE TABERNACLE
Lesson Text: Exod. 35:20-29. Golden Text: Prov. 3:9

We have recently studied the laws of worship, the place of worship, and now we come to the consideration of the gifts for the place of worship. The text of meeting had to be produced with its furnishings, and the people were instructed how to proceed in providing the necessary articles and the labor required.

Willing-Hearted

The motive which prompts the gift is the only just criterion of the giving. Gifts secured for religion under the strain of fear or pride or authority may have the same financial value as gifts spontaneously offered out of a willing heart, but they do not have the same spiritual value. It is the spirit in which men give that determines the real value of the offering. In the case of the tabernacle, spontaneity marked the attitude of the people as they brought their gifts to Moses. Every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whose spirit made him willing brought his offering to God in labor and material. The giving therefore was enthusiastic and joyous. No body complained of being "held up" or "robbed" by the organization. There was no necessity for protesting against high-pressure methods of getting money or its equivalent for the Lord's work. I have suggested a temporary moratorium on giving materials and labor for the building and furnishing of the tabernacle would have marked the one making the suggestion as demented or covetous. The hearts of the people were touched and their sympathies were aroused, and nothing could stop them from giving the things their hearts prompted them to give. This is the secret of all real stewardship. The methods of stewardship must be taught line upon line and precept upon precept, and systems must be devised whereby stewardship will register itself in practical results; but without the willing heart on the part of the giver, stewardship will continue to drag like the chariots of Pharaoh when the wheels came off.

Wise-Hearted

The willing heart was guided by the wise heart. Spontaneity needs system to conserve it to the best advantage. Evidently Moses had organized his people in such a simple and practical way that everybody had an opportunity to give what he was able to give. Those who could give labor were organized to give it where it would count most; those who could give materials were directed in such a way as not to interfere with spontaneity and yet conserve the offerings without waste. The giving was suited to the life of a primitive time. Giving today in its offerings and methods must be suited to modern times; but the spirit of willingness and wisdom in giving is eternal.

The Saving Sense

Speaking of fish stories, here's a cat story: A Londoner says that he has a cat which is in the habit of begging cheese from the family at dinner. A watch being kept on the animal, it was discovered that after eating the cheese it would go to a mousehole and breathe heavily down it.

There was a landlubber with the shipwrecked crew that had been adrift for two days, with hope at low ebb. "What's that?" exclaimed the landsman, pointing into the distance. "That's land, isn't it?" "I see nothing but the horizon," replied the first mate. "Well, hang it, that's better than nothing. Let's pull for it." —Capper's Weekly.

"It is not an easy matter to keep from eating a few aunts, while some savage races like them and eat them with intent," states a Jacksonville paper.

When it came to John Wesley's knowledge that one of his preachers was in needy circumstances, he sent him the following letter: "Dear Tommy: Trust in the Lord and do right. So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." He enclosed in the letter a five-pound note. When Tommy "returned thanks," Wesley was greatly delighted with his reply. It ran thus: "Reverend and Dear Sir: I have often been struck with the beauty of the passage you quote, and I am bound to say that I have never found such a useful expository note on it before."

opportunity afforded for the presentation of any interpretation of the nature and function of the church which prevails anywhere in Christendom. Indeed, provision for it has already been made. If Baptists are convinced of the soundness of their position surely a platform is provided here from which it can be broadly proclaimed. If it is intelligently and cogently presented Baptists might make some converts. On the other hand, the presentation of contrary views and of positions held by great historic churches for many centuries might, it is at least conceivable, modify the views of Baptists, at least in so far as to make them broader and more inclusive and less meticulous.

In a word, as it appears to the writer, there is everything to be gained and nothing to be lost if Baptists go heartily into the conference. Affection rests upon understanding. If we understood our Christian brethren better than we do we should love them more. The World Conference is an adventure in Christian brotherhood.

the candy case for a long time. At last the storekeeper remarked sarcastically: "Well, do you want to buy the earth with a little green fence around it?"

Folks, Facts and Opinion

The Baptist Courier of South Carolina adds its voice to the growing chorus of Baptist dissent to the proposal to make the reading of the Bible in the public schools a legal requirement.

The Soviet Union is cooperating with Chicago and New York capitalists to settle agricultural colonies of Jews on a considerable scale in both the Ukraine and Siberia, according to the American Israelite. It is proposed that the colony in Siberia take the form of a locally autonomous Jewish republic.

Because the convention system permitted bribery, the system of primaries was devised. But bribery continues in unprecedented measure. And voters have quit voting. Now it is proposed to return to the convention system—as if in a state of society in which there are profits in politics any device could prevent bribery.

Mr. Eli S. Reinhold, the director of the Crozer correspondence courses for twenty-five years since its organization, died Sunday morning, Aug. 29. Though he has been in delicate health for some years he was incapacitated only a few weeks. Hundreds of students to whom he has been an inspiring friend will unite in the sorrow for his loss and in sympathy with Mrs. Reinhold and the family.

Dr. Frederick W. Norwood, pastor of the City Temple, London, has been released for six months to carry on a peace crusade throughout Great Britain. The Western Christian Advocate renews with emphasis a suggestion made in THE BAPTIST some time ago that a similar crusade be undertaken by the churches in America. It says pertinently: "Is it not time that some such thing was attempted in this country? The American churches have pretty well all of them placed their resolutions on record. They are good resolutions. But we are spending more for armaments—ininitely more—than ever before, and if some drastic change does not come soon we shall plunge even deeper into that morass. Two years ago our politicians managed to secure the active ill will of the most important nation in the East, and every day multiplies evidences of the mounting ill will of the nations of Europe. South America has distrusted, where it has not actually hated, us for years. We do an enormous amount of talking about peace, but the raw fact is that almost every actual move we make is headed toward war. Cannot the peace crusade to be undertaken by the churches in England this fall be paralleled by the churches of America? Most of our Protestant churches have peace commissions. Can they not give this idea serious and immediate consideration?"

The death of Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, at the age of ninety-two, removes one of the most picturesque, original and masterful personalities in the educational history of the United States.

W. M. Danner, general secretary of the American Mission to Lepers, has completed a ten months' tour of inspection of leper colonies in Japan, Korea, China, Siam, India, Sumatra, Palestine, Hawaii and the Philippines. He organized a similar mission in and for China, with Chinese officers and administration. The Philippine colony on the island of Culion has 5000 lepers, being the most numerous colony in the world.

But Rev. Solomon Ream submits in the Christian World this clincher in the way of evidence which he thinks ought to silence all evolutionists: "There is in the biological world a process known as parthenogeny, that is, the production of an individual without fertilization. Examples of such are the drones (males) of honey-bees, which are developed from unfertilized eggs. Aphides multiply by this process and are prolific, virgin females producing millions of progeny. Unmated mothers among moths, silk worms, ants, etc., produce male and female offspring. With such wondrous creations in natural history, what may not a later development in biology prove among higher animals?" That is, the virgin birth is a unique, supernatural and saving miracle because nature is full of similar phenomena!

It is interesting to note that the American Bible Society is having no trouble with the Mexican government, but carries on its work in entirely harmonious relations with the civil authorities.

Two sermons of Saint Augustine in Latin manuscript are said to have been discovered recently by Rev. Gerardo Morin in the Ambrosiana library at Milan. Both of them relate to persecutions of Christians under the Roman empire.

International control of the fisheries of the great lakes is urged as the remedy for the rapid decrease of favorite varieties of fish, by Dr. Walter Koeltz, aquatic biologist of the United States bureau of fisheries. It is said that suckers are becoming more numerous than more valuable kinds—even as among humans.

Clarence Darrow, noted agnostic, delivered an address at Fisk university (negro), Nashville. The National Baptist Voice (negro paper) used high terms of praise for the speech of "this strong, uplifting and towering brother of men." It exclaimed: "He is great, and superlatively great, as his message on Tuesday last proclaims him, aside from anything else he has done in his renowned and well-filled life career." Whereat the Baptist and Reflector (white), Nashville, protests and warns the negroes that they are making poor choice of a hero to worship. And the Dayton case is still pending in Tennessee.

Nine great reforms credited to modern Turkey are enumerated by Mrs. Jeanette W. Emrich as marking the great advance of the Turks in the last few years. Having spent sixteen years in Turkey as a church and missionary worker, she is regarded as especially qualified to form an intelligent judgment of conditions. The list of reforms includes: the abolition of the Caliphate which has removed for all time the menace of Pan-Islam; the separation of the state from the domination of religion; the closing of the old mosque schools, which were centers of fanatical teaching, and the reorganization and secularization of education; the adoption of a new code of laws, patterned on the Swiss, repudiating the authority of Islam; the branding of polygamy as illegal and the reorganization of the social life of Turkey on a basis of equality of the sexes; the translation of the Koran into Turkish; the adoption of the Western calendar, from the birth of Christ, instead of the hegira of Mohammed; the emancipation of women, endorsed by the government and recognized as an essential of progress; the attempt to come abreast of Western civilization as shown in drastic reforms in dress and in the fields of science, agriculture and economics.

One of the interesting sights of the Tacony section of Philadelphia, which lies along the Delaware in the north-eastern outskirts of the city, is its famous Grindstone church, so called because it was built from grindstones worn out in making saws at the plant of Henry Disston & Sons, Inc., which covers sixty-five acres of Delaware river frontage a few blocks from the church. This church, the Tacony Baptist, includes in its congregation many of the 3600 workers in the Disston plant and their families. It

China is said to be seeking a loan of $25,000,000. The United States government protests. It says that China must first pay what she owes to Americans. Thus we avoid foreign entanglements.

Rev. J. A. Ohrn, pastor for twenty-six years of the Baptist church in Oslo, Norway, has been elected to the city council for a term of three years. He was drafted into this service by the demand of Christian people of different denominations, including even state church people.

The Federal Council of Churches through its commission on international justice and good-will has established a children's division for educational purposes, and the Ohio council has started a declamation contest under the title, "The Prince of Peace."

Mineral products of the United States for 1925 amounted to the value of $5,696,000,000, an increase of $300,000,000 over 1924. Some Americans have difficulty in deciding whether to credit this wealth to the Creator who put it into the ground for the common good or to the exploiter who takes it out for private profit.

Big Chief Horse Eagle, 104 years old, dedicated Bible Rock at the Y. M. C. A. boys' camp, Sacramento, Calif. The rock has attached to it a box containing a Bible and is an inviting place for one to go for quiet meditation. Such presents are being made to boys' camps in California by Wm. H. Carlin of Santa Barbara.

White women are marrying negro seamen in English ports, so the story goes in the day's news. Just how extensive is the practice does not appear. The story has a naive generality as if all of the blacks in those ports were marrying all of the whites, in which case everybody ought to be satisfied. Be the extent of the practice what it may, the story relates circumstantially that the actual participants find themselves satisfied with the resulting social status.

"There have always been Baptist churches in good standing which received members without immersion." This quotation from THE BAPTIST of July 3 is questioned and specifications are desired. Newman is a living Baptist historian generally accepted as of the first rank. In his "Manual of Church History," page 171, he relates that in 1524-5 the "strictly scriptural Baptists," Grebel, Reublin, Blaurock, Mantz and others, baptized multitudes in a few weeks otherwise than by immersion, and that Hubmaier baptized more than 300 "out of a milk pail." He also notes the well-known fact that many English Baptist churches receive members from Pedobaptist churches without believer's baptism. It is reliably stated that more than 600 Baptist churches in the United States receive to some form of membership persons who are not "immersed believers." This covers 400 years, the period of modern and authentic Baptist history, and of course it is not "always." Correct practice is to be distinguished from good standing. Correct practice is conformity to the teaching of the New Testament. Good standing is that status in which cooperative fellowship exists. Such a fellowship existed in 1525 between the Grebel group and the immersionists of St. Gall. They wrought and suffered together and are honored together as Baptist martyrs. Such fellowship has existed and exists among the two groups in England. Such fellowship exists among the two groups in the United States today. One may have his own opinion about proprieties, but the status is a matter of fact.

A PHILADELPHIA CHURCH BUILT OF GRINDSTONES. INSERT SHOWS HOW STONES WERE CUT.

as natural then when the building was erected a few years ago that the idea of utilizing some of the thousands of grindstones that lay piled on the grounds of the big saw works should suggest itself. Already several thousands of these grindstones had been used in building a wall several blocks long that partly encloses the Disston plant and in building a retaining wall along the Delaware river side of the works. More than 2500 grindstones were used in building the church. They were carefully squared and dressed before they were placed in the church walls and no one who sees this handsome place of worship today would suspect that it was built from stones originally used in grinding saws and tools to be sold around the world.

For the Baptist student work in greater Boston a house has been secured which will be occupied early in September by Newton C. Fetter, minister for student work, and his family. The house is located at 335 Harvard street, Cambridge, midway between Harvard university and Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Miss Lois Maupin, secretary for Baptist women students, will also reside at the Harvard street house. It is intended that the residence shall be a place where men and women students may come to plan their religious work, to meet in a social way, to discuss their numerous problems and just to be "at home" for a while. A large living room, equipped with fireplace and piano, will always be available for social and discussional purposes. Miss Maupin and Mr. Fetter will be glad to receive the names of Baptist students who are planning to attend any of the institutions of learning in greater Boston.

The story of the virgin birth of Christ is likely to stay in the Bible as long as there is any Bible. Its greatest weakness is in the way some of its friends argue for it. Miracle or myth seems to be the true alternative. If the story is true, there is a clear case of the intervention of supernatural power.

Attention was called in these columns some time ago to the organization of leagues for the suppression of crime composed only of business men, but ostensibly acting for the community. Why do no names of representatives of wage-workers appear as members of such organizations? The question is relevant. No answer is attempted, but it is due. Class crime and class enforcement of law are dangerous. If they exist, one of the most vital duties of citizenship is to find out why. Especially, since the last number of the Employers' News frankly charges organized labor with the commission or condonation of crime which the law-abiding members of the unions are powerless to correct.

World organization realigning scholars of all nations for common action to advance the aims of history has been effected through effort begun by representatives of the United States. A permanent international committee of historical sciences, with Prof. H. Koht of the University of Oslo, Norway, as president, has been formed. Provisional headquarters will be established in Washington, though the secretariat will function actively from the Institute of Intellectual Cooperation in Paris. An international congress of historians has already been arranged for at Oslo in 1928. —The United States Daily.

When is a monsoon a success? In India that question is no joke. When the annual monsoon brings enough rain to insure a good crop it is said to be "successful." This year it is reported to be successful throughout India, and it is still blowing.

In harmony with its program of constructive denominational expression, the Baptist Record of Iowa prints an article from Prof. G. T. W. Patrick of the University of Iowa on "Evolutionist and Fundamentalist," in which he attempts a frank and irenic statement of the case with a view to an understanding and harmony. He defines evolution as "a creative process, something new appearing at every step of the developmental history"; states that "while the fact of evolution is not in doubt, the belief in it being firmer today than ever before, neither the causes of evolution nor the manner are known," and thinks that much of the controversy is due to the fact that the term evolution imperfectly expresses the process of development.

On Baptist unity Dr. C. E. Dargan says in the Review and Expositor: "We joyfully recognize that the true principle for attaining unto further unity is not force, nor pressure, nor fear, but these two irreducible principles: loyalty to Christ and liberty in Christ. Here lies the solution of our problem: that we shall be true to Jesus Christ our Lord, as he is revealed in scripture, exhibited in history, and enthroned in personal experience, the divine Lord and Saviour. On the basis of this loyalty there should be the fullest freedom of thought and the most loving conference. Recognizing some inevitable differences here and there, according to each other the right to differ, we seek candidly, honestly, and sincerely to know the mind and will of God in Christ, both for our own guidance and blessing, and as the hope of the world."

Concerning the infallibility of the Bible, a Baptist exchange offers this temperate line of reasoning: "There are many difficulties in the interpretation of the scriptures. There is no denying this. And these difficulties should be faced in all openness and candor, and with tolerance for all honest differences of reverent views. But we believe that it is a mistake to seek to overcome or remove the difficulties of interpretation by denying the doctrine of the infallibility of the scriptures. As we see the matter, the doctrines of the divinity of the Bible and of its infallibility are correlatives. The one involves the other; and if one goes the other follows it. This is our view. We do not mean to intimate that others must see that matter as we do. There are those, we know, who have very sincere belief in the divinity of the scriptures but who do not hold to its infallibility. But we look on their position as illogical, for we see no possible way of maintaining the divinity of a fallible book." But this view removes the doctrine of infallibility from the field of faith and makes it a hypothesis of theology. How far does it express the mind of the denomination?

A continuous close season has been prescribed throughout the United States on black-bellied and golden plovers, according to the Biological Survey of the United States department of agriculture, which is charged with the enforcement of the migratory-bird treaty act. Hunters are reminded by the bureau that persons killing these birds are subject to prosecution in federal court.

Divine healing is practiced by a considerable number of the clergy of the church of England and an imposing permanent committee has been constituted to observe and advise the church concerning the practice. Remarkable stories are told of people being cured of blindness, deafness, rheumatism, cancer and other difficult or incurable diseases, by prayer and the laying on of hands.

The bishop of Durham is quoted as saying that the gospel of Jesus Christ is essentially socialistic, but that the gospel teaches the socialism of those who give and not of those who take. Much socialism, as advocated by certain individuals and groups, is nothing but the advocacy of some scheme by which the tables may be turned and the oppressed become oppressors. There's nothing Christian about oppression, whoever happens to be on top. But it is certainly Christian to endeavor to devise improved social and industrial methods by which nobody will be oppressed but all will receive both justice and mercy and full opportunity for the utmost possible development and that abundant life which Jesus came to give.—The Presbyterian Advance.

Things That Endure

HONOR and truth and manhood—
These are the things that stand,
Though the sneer and jibe of the cynic tribe
Are loud through the width of the land.
The scoffer may lord it an hour on earth,
And a lie may live for a day.
But truth and honor and manly worth
Are things that endure alway.

Courage and toil and service,
Old, yet forever new—These are the rock that abides the shock
And holds through the storm, flint-true.
Fad and folly, the whims of an hour,
May bicker and rant and shrill;
But the living granite of truth will tower
Long after their rage is still.

Labor and love and virtue—
Time does not dim their glow;
Though the smart may say, in their languid way
"Oh, we've outgrown all that, you know!"
But a lie, whatever the guise it wears,
Is a lie as it was of yore,
And a truth that has lasted a million years
Is good for a million more!
—TED OLSON in American Israelite.

Charles O'Neal tells in the Searchlight a gruesome story of brutality on the part of the police of Kansas City in dealing with negroes under arrest. Particulars need not be repeated, but one of two things is clear: either the police of that city need serious attention or the Record-Searchlight needs more scrupulous editing.

Mrs. Nancy Schoonmaker of New York, who was sent by the League of Women Voters and the General Federation of Women's Clubs to make a survey of the political activities of the women of Europe, reports that in her opinion the war taught American Christians five lessons, namely: (1) we are not too civilized to fight; (2) to be prepared does not prevent war; (3) war settles nothing; (4) America cannot stay out; (5) peace can be secured only by effective political action.

Rev. A. E. Rapp, pastor of the Logan church, Philadelphia, is again preaching this summer to the crowds on the steamers of the Hudson River Day Line, running between New York and Albany. This line has seven steamers, and engages as many speakers and soloists. As they pull from their pier in New York, the chaplain's flag is raised, and one hour later services begin. Each speaker also takes his turn at Indian Point, which is the company's park fifty miles north on the Hudson, where a spacious auditorium accommodates all who desire to attend the services. This is Mr. Rapp's fourth season with the line. Mr. E. E. Olcott is the third generation operating this line, it being founded by the first generation 100 years ago. Mr. Olcott is an active church member, one of his sons is general manager of the line, and another a missionary on the foreign field.

Causes, aims and ends of the war have seldom found a more clear and compact statement than in a recent editorial in the Chicago Tribune from which this extract is taken: "Some of the promotion was skillful and some was clumsy. The most adroit was the British. The most blundering was the German. There was desperate need to win the case in American opinion. The United States was divided along lines of previous nationality, traditions, historical sympathies; etc. Absurdities took on the stamp of verity. We even accepted Russia of the czars as 'one of the great liberal powers of Europe,' a champion of the cause of democracy. We set this war apart from all other wars in Europe as of singular gravity to our ideals. We did not try to see it against its historical background. We did not have any for it. We became dogmatic, although not agreed, as to right and wrong. Our decisions, whatever they were, had a finality which conceded nothing. We became the victims of phrases. Our economic interests flowed in the wake of sea power, and anxious as most of the people were to keep out of the shell fire, we found our feet slipping. An election to keep us out of war was followed by a war in spite of the election. The president won a return

Pastors and Laymen to the Front

SUCCESS in satisfying measure in the proposed evangelistic efforts of the coming fall and winter is conditioned by certain indispensable factors. Two of these factors invite consideration here.

Secretarial agencies of the denomination have their place in the movement, but they are subordinate. They can be helpful but they are not essential. The committee of fifteen is, of course, personally acceptable. It has announced its organization and plans, and they seem admirable. It ought to receive cordial welcome and cooperation everywhere. But if this movement is to show the vitality it ought to possess and to achieve the results that it ought to achieve, it ought not to have been greatly hindered even if the Northern Baptist Convention had forgotten to appoint such a committee.

Acceptable Baptist evangelists have their place, and one of them ought to be idle during the coming season. But they are subordinate. With the factors that ought to be considered in full general operation, the movement as a whole ought not to be perceptibly retarded even if no professional evangelists were available.

We set out to call attention to the vast reservoir of power for evangelism which lies latent or only partly developed in the pastors and laymen of our churches. It is nothing new to say that the success of evangelism as of all great cooperative enterprises of the kingdom lies in the hands of the pastors and laymen. But it is important just now for everybody to realize their primacy and to build upon it our whole program of procedure.

Everything depends upon the realization of this primacy by the pastors and laymen themselves. Nobody is going to call it in question. No one whose sense of values and fitness is normal, is going to try to displace the local working forces, to give them orders, to interfere with them in any way, or to get along without them. The danger is that they may wait for somebody to come along and hand out a good plan or compute to the local forces some special element of efficiency. The thing is not to be done in that way. The pastor and his people in the local church are the divinely-ordained agency for the evangelization of their particular field. They may find helpers, but there can be no adequate substitute for them, and unless there is a blunder somewhere they can have no rival.

Sometimes a pastor finds himself hindered from entering enthusiastically into evangelistic work by the conscious lack of special training and temperament for such work. But who insists that special training and temperament are required for it? Has the pastor personality? Has he some acceptance in leadership among the people? Has he the experience of a saving acquaintance with Christ? Has he friendly contact with the people? Then he knows how to direct people to Christ. He may not be eminent in evangelistic qualifications; but he is responsible only for what he has. Let him go to work with courage, faith and joy.

No pastor need wait until he has a sure thing in the way of organization and methods. Such a thing does not exist. Let him use the material at hand according to his best judgment and in the light of such information as he may be able to secure; and then ease his mind of the problem of mechanism. Evangelism depends more upon personality than upon method. Soul-winning is largely a personal process. Nobody ever knows how he does it. Methods never yet brought a revival.

Lay evangelism, however, is the supremely important thing. Christianity of the primitive type is a laymen's movement, purely so. The new enlistment of the laity, men, women and young people, for the Christian life service, is normal and ought to be universal. It ought to project itself with tenfold momentum into the field of evangelism.

The people need not wait for secretary, professional evangelist or any sort of clerical direction or orders. As Christians they hold in their hands the whole gospel commission. Anybody who knows Christ and knows the way to reach him ought to lead others to him. This is the layman's supreme business in life, and the layman's way of doing it is the only way it can be done. In evangelism order and office count for nothing—it is man to man.

It can be done anywhere. Five or six country boys in their late teens and early twenties, in a purely rural community in Indiana, miles distant from even a village, became interested in the salvation of their neighbors. With only rural school training, they began to hold prayer meetings, visit Sunday schools and give testimonies in such public meetings as offered opportunity. Finally they undertook to conduct simple gospel meetings. In one winter those young men led more than seventy-five people to Christ and into the churches of the neighborhood.

Almost every local church has unknown sources of power latent in its own membership. Called out in all of our 8000 churches, and enlisted and filled with the spirit of Christ, these pastors and people can do a work this year that will surpass all of our dreams. The urge is the essential element in evangelism. Enthusiasm to communicate the good news of Christian experience to another is the sine qua non. Fires are always started with fire. A cold hearth beautifully finished with fuel all arranged to touch off never warms anybody. But when lighted with a match all the potential heat and radiance are released as if by magic. So it is with evangelism. We need to be baptized with fire. It will pay to wait for the fire to fall upon a praying people, for if we go forth to an evangelistic campaign without the enthusiasm that feeds at the fires of God's love and power, we may work but our labor will be in vain. Therefore we call upon all the pastors and laymen of the denomination to seek again that warmth of soul and radiance of enthusiasm which come only to those who wait upon the Lord in prayer and who look to him for the increase.

The Kiwanis Magazine

KIWANIS, a business fellowship, patterned after the idea of the Rotarian movement, has been in existence for more than a decade. It publishes a monthly magazine of generous proportions, of excellent quality and full of highly interesting contents bearing chiefly upon the purposes and activities of the Kiwanis clubs scattered for the most part throughout the United States and Canada. But the thing that interested us most in reading a recent issue of the magazine was the announcement that this organ of Kiwanis has now passed the 100,000 mark in circulation. This means that nearly every Kiwanis is a subscriber to the magazine. In fact, if there is a member who does not subscribe, we venture the guess that he is not a good Kiwanis. Such a member is not intelligent about the plans and progress of Kiwanis unless he has access to the magazine without subscribing for it personally. We wonder what motive has actuated so many members of Kiwanis to subscribe for the magazine. Is it not, allowing for all lesser motives, the pride that each member has in the organization and work and fellowship of Kiwanis? The enthusiasm for Kiwanis has built up the magazine and produced more than 100,000 bona fide subscribers.

THE BAPTIST is the official weekly newspaper of the Northern Baptist Convention. It is now in its seventh year attempting to serve a constituency several times larger than Kiwanis, but it cannot claim 100,000 subscribers. Why? Simply because Baptists are not as loyal to their official denominational organ as the members of Kiwanis are to the Kiwanis Magazine. Kiwanis loyalty puts Baptist loyalty to shame. A membership in Kiwanis is based upon regular payment of dues, upon regular attendance at the weekly luncheon and meeting, and upon taking some active part in the work of the local club. If Baptist loyalty should be tested by such standards, its average, compared with the average of Kiwanis loyalty, would appear as unfavorable as the circulation of THE BAPTIST compared with the circulation of the Kiwanis Magazine. This is a correct diagnosis of the situation as far as it goes. The larger circulation of THE BAPTIST waits upon an increase of denominational pride and upon a greater measure of enthusiastic Baptist loyalty.

Again the Liquor Problem is Solved

QUEBEC is the place. Norman Hapgood is the discoverer. He writes under his own name in the Herald-Examiner of July 18. He finds in operation in Quebec a plan that solves the liquor problem in a manner that pleases "practically all" of the people.

What is the magical solution? It is essentially the old Swedish plan of letting the government run the liquor business with safeguarding restrictions, with a steady public pressure to reduce drinking, and with the profits going into the public treasury. Singularly enough, the main emphasis in the story is laid on the enormous financial profits to the government. Other theoretical benefits are, taking the business out of private hands for private gain, the promotion of sobriety and thrift, industrial efficiency, and ease of law enforcement.

The plan was respectably proposed in the United States more than twenty years ago, but liquor men, prohibitionists, politicians, business men and churchmen, with one voice scouted it. In fairness, however, Mr. Hapgood himself may tell what he finds to justify his enthusiasm for the plan as it actually works in the province of Quebec.

First, he notes that after many years of trial in Sweden the plan is threatened there by a rising prohibition movement. Then he goes on, "The consumption of light wine and beer steadily increases." In Montreal, "It is true that gambling is not much regulated, that the police are not too honest and that prostitution flourishes more than in any city in the United States, as far as I know, except one." The Catholic clergy "are of the greatest assistance to the successful working of the plan, both by telling their parishioners about the duty of obeying the law and by cooperating with the liquor commission to stamp out illicit stills."

As if these facts were not enough, the story goes on to say that abstinence is not so important to the workingmen of Quebec as of the United States because they are not so ambitious and their standard of efficiency is not so high.

One advantage possessed by the Quebec law over the Volstead law is that it has seemingly the solid support of the press and the priests in favor of its enforcement as a policy of good citizenship. In this country an influential section of the press is frankly arrayed against either obedience to the law or its enforcement, and the position of the priest as a body has not found audible expression. Let those influential classes recognize their part in orderly and lawful government as frankly and loyally as they do in Quebec and then in five years compare results. In fact it is no clear from his report that even under the far more favorable circumstances there existing, the public dispensary is working in Quebec better than prohibition in the United States. There is no evidence, indeed, that it would work in the United States or that it has a ghost of a chance for adoption.

Kiss or Be Barred Is Pope's Ultimatum

"Fifty Americans were refused an audience with the pope as a mark of papal displeasure"—so says a news note. What had ruffled the calm of the "vicar of Christ?" An English Protestant had refused to kneel and kiss the ring on the papal finger. So, poetic justice's meted out to fifty Americans for the offense of one Englishman. But are we to understand that only one visiting Protestant has refused to kneel and kiss the pope's ring? Prominent Protestants may, if so disposed, "decline to answer."

Is Principle or Power The Issue in Mexico?

From statements issued by the Catholic prelates one may conclude that the government of Mexico has set out upon a program of spoliation to destroy religion. But it happens that the Protestant leaders in that country view the matter in a different light. An evangelical mission from the United States has just completed a tour of investigation in Mexico and its report is favorable to the policy of the Mexican government. A survey of the available documents leaves one with the impression that the real issue is not religion but clerical domination. A glaring fact is that in the dispute the Mexican bishops can do nothing toward a settlement except with the approval of the pope. That fact reveals the inner nature of the whole controversy. No country can be free whose government must look to Rome for its validity. One good may come out of the quarrel: it relates may plead for religious liberty so strongly in Mexico that they will be unable to deny it in Spain.

France and Italy May Both Learn and Teach Something

France is reported to have adopted bread rationing again as in the war. Italy bans "luxury building" and necessary will purchase building material by wholesale and at special discounts to put up dwellings for the poor. Thus both nations are taking elementary lessons in community economics at the point of consumption. The Italian program is far in advance of the French, but both are on the way to a discovery in the economics of consumption. If they really make that discovery they will revolutionize both nations, and the benefits of the discovery will compel other nations to accept it.

Has Europe Taken a Lunge into Paganism?

So thinks the Los Angeles Times. Editorially it reasons thus: "Paganism in western Europe is worse than anything in Africa. . . . They have discarded the old faith in morality, in justice and in the future. . . . Europe needs missionaries more than it needs dollars. . . . A whole generation has been plunged into spiritual darkness. . . . Socialism and communism cannot fill the vacant places." Well, not a few careful critics are saying that America also is pagan. It is possible in other case to paint the picture too dark. There is probably as much religious faith in Europe today as there ever was. Prophetic spirits have always pointed out that the religion of Europe—also of America—is largely veneer. By the faith that is left we discover the faith that existed before the war. Of course socialism and communism cannot fill the vacant places. Neither can capitalism, prosperity, plutocracy, autocracy, dictatorship, hierarchy, imperialism, nor republicanism. Nothing but the spirit of Jesus can. The world is still our needy mission field. Let Christianity gird itself for this newly discovered task.

May the Church Say, "Thou Shalt Not Kill"?

Church leaders in Great Britain tried to find a way to end the coal strike. Ought they to have done so? Opinions differ. Lloyd George says: "I wish to God they had interfered in 1914." Premier Baldwin resented their efforts. Dean Inge slurred the parsons who, "finding their people bored with religion and not having much to say on that subject themselves, gladly escape to politics, in which there is so much more excitement and actuality." Dr. John Hutton, editor of the British Weekly, deplors the fact that "during the last twenty years the church has steadily allowed herself as a social and political force to fall into such a position that politicians and newspapers can afford to neglect her." The scriptures contain such social sayings as, "Thou shalt not oppress the hireling," "Blessed are the peacemakers," and others of like social import. Has the church any business with such sayings beyond quoting them on Sundays?

This Premature Boasting Spoils the Advertisement

Ever since the eucharistic congress busy rhetoricians have overtaxed the lexicon of glory trying to tell what a triumph that event was for the interests of Roman Catholicism. Even the common decencies and courtesies that Americans are in the habit of extending to everybody are interpreted as a tribute to Romanism. Cardinal Dubois, for instance, is quoted as being "particularly struck by the full liberty allowed the organizers of the congress," and as believing it to be evidence that through this pageant the church "made a strong impression, especially on those dissenting from its doctrines or belonging to no religion." It is a pity to have to say to our recent visitors that we were merely showing our good manners, that we have already almost forgotten the congress, and that the more they boast of their ecclesiastical triumph, the more we wonder whether, after all, our courtesy was wasted.

Will Mobilize Black African Pagans for "Christian" Conquest

From Paris comes the report that the French chamber of deputies has voted three hundred million francs to build a railroad from Brazzaville in the French Congo to the Atlantic. Such a beneficent enterprise seems to compensate the world in general for a part of the loss to the United States in the settlement of the French debt. It looks like a good investment in which Christian civilization stands to gain. But hold! the report is in a single sentence, and the latter half of the sentence runs on, "thus making it possible for France to mobilize large numbers of black troops swiftly in case of emergency." Is it for this the United States is requested to scale down the French debt? Is it for this the maimed French veterans were paraded in a pathetic appeal to American sympathy? Those French are a glorious people, but glory bedraggled is an appalling spectacle. And the spectacle of France spending millions out of her alleged poverty and bankruptcy to mobilize armies of black pagans for some new war of conquest cannot be contemplated with moral enthusiasm.

On the Road to Carcassonne

Everything has happened at Carcassonne that could happen—and it looks it.

BY WINFRED ERNEST GARRISON

FROM Paris to Toulouse is a twelve-hour ride on a fast train, straight south through the heart of France. It is a country which it would be easy to love, green, fruitful, featureful, with a pleasing alternation of field and forest, so that one is never in the woods yet never far from trees, and with abundant visible evidence in the old towns that it has been lived in for a long time. It is like turning the pages of a history that is half romance like Froissart, or a romance that is half history, like the "Chanson de Roland," without stopping to read. One gets a sense of passing years and of contemporary life rooted in the deep soil of old experience. The southern half, beyond Limoges, is even more appealing. The terrain is more broken as the route passes along the western shoulder of that massif central which rises to a height of 3000 or 4000 feet in the middle of France. The foliage is as fresh as spring and as lush as midsummer. No two acres are alike. It is full of recognizable places. One acquainted with the country could tell where he is at any moment by looking out of the window. A ruined castle on a hilltop beside a rushing stream is a trite thing to mention, but a landmark to see and a stimulus to the imagination.

Cheap Traveling

For what it may be worth, as bearing upon international finance, the rate of exchange, and the problem of interallied debts, I may also mention the fact that travel is cheap. A third class ticket (which I took because there is no fourth) for the 440 miles cost about $2.20. At lunch time my traveling companions drew from their hampers gargantuan sandwiches a foot long (a section of a loaf halved horizontally) and bottles of wine, but I acquired distinction by going into the dining-car. I came too late, said the waiter. Dejeuner was fini. Well, he might get me some eggs. All right, bring on the eggs. They came. And perhaps there might be some cold lamb. There was. It could be made hot if I wished. I did. Also there appeared successively, as discoveries by him and surprises to me, two vegetables, a salad, gruyere cheese, and excellent patisserie. Not so bad, considering that luncheon was finished before I came. Forty cents—on a dining car—including a tip which confirmed the waiter's judgment in hunting up food for a belated third-class passenger. I shall not hereafter say much about food or money—both themes too sordid to engage the attention of my readers though not negligible features of travel for me—but somewhere I had to say that there are no bad cooks in France (except one at Lourdes and he is not very bad) and that traveling in France this summer is cheaper than staying at home.

Toulouse is a rosy-pink city whose old brick-built houses seem to glow with the warmth of all the sunsets they have seen since the town was young, which was many centuries ago. Compared with stone as a building material, brick may lack something of dignity—though personally I doubt even that—but it gains in a sense of intimacy and domesticity, and it leaves nothing to be desired in respect to durability. Nothing lasts better than well-burned clay. And Toulouse is built of mellow rose-colored bricks, with tile roofs to match. I went to Toulouse partly because, being in doubt whether to enter the Pyrenees at the east or the west end, it seemed a reasonable compromise to approach them in the middle and view their glory from afar from the "Hill of the Column." The column commemorates the battle of Toulouse where 8000 men lost their lives defending the cause of Napoleon a week after he had abdicated, like the battle of New Orleans. Whether it was a snowy mountain-top or a shining cloud that I saw from the hill, I am not sure, for the weather was not perfect; but it served the purpose. It was in the right place for the Pyrenees, and one could as easily picture Spain beginning there whether it was cloud or mountain.

There have been other and pleasanter battles fought at Toulouse than that of Napoleon's legions. In 1323 the oldest literary society in Europe was founded here—the College de Gai Savoir. Would that there were more colleges of joyful learning! But this was, and is, a college without faculty or classes, an association formed to promote an annual literary competition, the prizes for which are golden flowers—rose, lily, violet and amaranth. It still exists as the Academie des Jeux Floreux, and is housed, together with five other learned societies, in a splendid old mansion the donor of which made this specification in his deed of gift: "I require that there shall never be any discussion of political or religious questions here, for I love those things which unite the hearts of men and I hate everything which divides them."

Bloodless Battles

Toulouse has reason to know the horrors of religious controversy for this was the focus of the crusade against the Albigensians in the thirteenth century. The south of France was wonderfully fertile in heretics and non-conformists before the Reformation. One crosses their trail everywhere—at Nimes on the east, which is still the most strongly Protestant city in France; at Narbonne, where the expulsion of the Jews is assigned as one of the chief causes of the commercial collapse of the city; at Carcassonne where Count Roger de Trancavel, when summoned by a papal legate to extirpate heresy, replied that in his domain every man should worship God as God gave him grace and that he had a roof to shelter and a sword to defend all who were persecuted for their faith in Provence; at Paw, where the guide in the chateau makes a terrible tale of the assassination of six Catholic prisoners after a banquet by order of the Protestant queen of Navarre, Jeanne d'Albret; at St. Jean Pied de Port, where they show you the bishop's prison, a noisome underground dungeon in which victims of the inquisition were chained by the neck and starved until a banquet and a swift assassination would have been a welcome relief.

Still another bloodless battle was fought at Toulouse, the battle between the Romanesque and Gothic in architecture. The church of St. Sernin is "the largest and most perfect Romanesque building in France." It represents the climax of eleventh century architecture. In the same century the cathedral of St. Etienne was begun and its Romanesque nave was built. But new ideas rose and new styles were introduced. Two centuries later a vast choir was built on Gothic lines. The idea was to tear down the old-fashioned Romanesque nave later and build a Gothic nave, so the Gothic choir was built a rod or two away and, as it happened, not on the same axis. But funds were lacking for the enterprise, and so for some centuries Gothic choir and Romanesque nave stood as two separate buildings but theoretically one church. Architectural conservatives still scorned the new-fangled Gothic and enriched and adorned the old church, while the architectural progressives lavished their resources upon the embellishment of the new until both became so beautiful that neither could possibly be torn down to make room for the completion of the other. And so, in the early years of the sixteenth century, the battle of styles having long since lost its acrimony, the adjacent end walls were knocked out and the two buildings were made one by an extension of the choir. And what a one! Surely it is the strangest church in France—the choir twice as long as the nave and half again as high; the high altar in a corner and a vast column at the head of the nave where the altar should be; and a diagonal passage from one part to the other where the two ends fail to fit, like the bones in a badly set broken leg. But artistic controversy is so much less bitter than religious that, so far as the records show, nobody was sent to the rack or thrown into a dungeon for his preference for Gothic or Romanesque even in the liveliest days of argument.

But architectural heresies are common in Toulouse. The church of the Jacobins has a row of enormous columns seventy feet high stalking down the center of the nave and delicate fan-vaulting spreading from their summits. This was considered so safe a place during the war that the Mona Lisa and other art treasures from Paris were stored there, but the tower fell last Easter and killed a baker and his family in the adjoining street. A sudden shower drove me into a nearby doorway where an old lady invited me in and entertained me with this and other facts—chiefly about herself and her daughter, and her grandson, and her grandson's wife who died when the youngest baby was a year old, and about her great-granddaughter who was playing about the room. She had been in northern France during the war and had seen a good deal of the Germans, against whom she bore no grudge and for whom she expressed great admiration. She especially marvelled at their quickness in learning languages. "We couldn't speak a word of their language," she said, "but after a month or two they understood everything we said. Some people are so intelligent. All you foreigners seem to speak several languages." I let the complacent pass. It was sufficiently undeserved. For example, I could not understand a word of the Toulousan patois that she and the child spoke to each other, though they both had also good French for use with outsiders. A great part of the people in southern France are bilingual, with Catalan or Basque or a local dialect for a second language.

The decision was in favor of entering the Pyrenees at the Mediterranean end, chiefly because Carcassonne lay in that direction only one or two hour's ride. When one is so near to Carcassonne he should go there at once, for the world might come to an end or some other accident happen, and then he would always be sorry to have missed it. The name itself is music, and its battlemented walls are poetry, and its history is high romance. Everything has happened here that could happen—foundation by the Romans, occupation by the Visigoths and Saracens, a siege by Charlemagne, capture by Simon de Montfort, an assault by the Black Prince, the building of a church by Louis the Saint, besides jousts and tournaments and the visits of troubadours. And it looks it. A hill with a cliff-like face rising above a river is crowned with a double rampart from which rise more than fifty towers. One road enters—over a drawbridge—but there are two or three narrow posterns by which one person at a time might come up steep paths commanded by loop-holes for scores of bowmen. There is every device of construction and equipment known to mediaeval military science to discourage the entrance of unwelcome guests and the whole is blended into an ensemble which perfectly preserves the character of a fortified town of the pre-powder age. It is not merely a fort, but a town; people live there. There is a school and a postoffice, and grocery stores and wine-shops. These all appear to be contemporary with the walls and the castle—whether they are or not. Nothing looks new except the hotel, which tries hard to look mediaeval but fails.

Yes, the barbarities of war are given a heavy gilding of romance at Carcassonne. But the guard who showed me around the ramparts, a one-armed soldier of fifty years, knew things about war that he had not learned by reading the old romance or contemplating the loveliness of Carcassonne. He was discoursing in the usual routine manner of guards upon the romantic glories of the place when I hazarded the suggestion that the men who were killed by a flight of arrows from a beautiful wall with a fine view of the Pyrenees were just as lamentably and unnecessarily dead as those who were blown up in a muddy trench. His tone changed. "Yes," he said, "we are still doing the same old nonsense. I fought—three years—then this (waving his empty sleeve), and lucky to get out with one arm and my head. And what was it all for? Nobody knows. All we know is that what they told us then was a pack of lies. Every man in this guard is a crippled soldier, and every one of them thinks just as I do about it—all but the chief. He is a patriot"—with much sarcasm in the word. "But what can we do except teach our children that war is wicked and foolish and useless?" War had no glamour for him, not even at Carcassonne with the banners of Charlemagne still waving before the imagination and the songs of the troubadours still in the air.

Intolerance

A CROSS the way my neighbor's windows shine, His roof-tree shields him from the storms that frown;
He toiled and saved to build it, staunch and brown,
And though my neighbor's house is not like mine,
I would not pull it down!

*With patient care my neighbor too, had built
A house of faith, wherein his soul might stay,
A haven from the winds that sweep life's way.
It differed from my own—I felt no guilt—
I burned it yesterday!*

The Churches of Europe and the Peace Movement

By GEORGE STEWART AND ADOLF KELLER

(Doctor Stewart has made six trips through the Near East and all countries of Europe except Norway and Sweden, twice visiting Russia in the interest of stricken students and professors. He and Doctor Keller have in preparation "A Handbook of European Protestantism.")

WITH the exception of small groups of pacifists, no section of any warring nation refused to identify itself with the national interest during the war.

Churches in their effort to spiritualize the whole of life have become too much a part of the warp and woof of this world to extricate themselves in time of war. Although the guardians of values in two worlds, they found themselves in August, 1914, giving themselves wholly to the national cause. During the great conflict they exercised a powerful influence in all warring countries for the conservation of ethics and spiritual values. The vast conflagration was more than human minds and hearts could understand at the time, and in the midst of the maelstrom the church often found itself confused. Thousands of religious men within and without the priesthood served their country without hatred in their hearts for those beyond the barbed wire. Others fell into the general nationalistic psychosis of hatred and revenge. The church visible was a part of the present world order and entered with it into the travail of 1914 to 1918.

Throughout all nations, the churches generally sought to justify war before the Christian conscience and encourage the nation to put forth its greatest efforts of sacrifice and of valor. Ministers, priests and students preparing for the ministry went to the front as chaplains and as soldiers in the ranks. The ethical right of the ministry to do active military service was not questioned except among a few groups. The minister was a part of the fatherland and felt he had a right to give his life for his people. Those who were hindered by the merciless requirements of the sermon on the mount were severely criticized.¹ They were regarded as dreamers who lived apart from the hard realities of life.

A War Theology

Thus crept in insidiously among the warring nations a war-theology. Texts were sought from the Old Testament, and the sixth commandment was laid aside. War was conceived as a great iron broom sweeping the world and cleansing it from the vices of effeminacy. It was "God's judgment" on a world filled with sin, the first horseman of the Apocalypse turned loose to clear his world. The first response of nobility and heroism, so prominent in every fighting army, gave color to the claim that war stimulated the highest moral feeling and unselfish service. To those whose lives were divided, frustrated and ineffectual, the centering of their efforts in one imperative purpose brought a feeling of peace and coherence.

As the war continued for months and years, few would have ventured to speak of its blessings and the immense majority realized that it came as a scourge upon the backs of every people. Scepticism and bitter disappointment prepared the way for widespread pacifism. Thousands became attracted to new eschatological and pre-millenarian movements which had spread over the old world and in certain sections of the new. Religious feeling has found a new attitude toward the world, as the sinful opposite of God's kingdom. A new antagonism between the energies of this world and God's will is manifest. God is known better because we no more so easily identify his aims with the best that is to be found in the present system. God is understood better because we conceive him as totally different from the world and opposed to its ways. In the great field of the literature of discouragement and defeat, one discovers an apocalyptic strain such as existed among the hard-pressed Israelites in the period when the Book of Daniel was written, a movement which flared out so brilliantly in art and literature in the period of Poland's great tribulation and became known as Polish Messianism.

In several centers large groups were formed to spread pacifist ideas among the people and to insist upon general disarmament. Organizations appeared in Sweden and Holland and Switzerland. After the war these Continental organizations issued official statements similar to the one published by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and declared war as utterly opposed to the spirit of Christ. Pacifism took strong hold of many religious groups in England. British Quakers led in this pacifist effort. The combination of the social emphasis in religion plus the tradition of individual liberty created a favorable atmosphere for pacifist thought in Great Britain. The Copec Conference in Birmingham, England, in 1925, was animated by a similar spirit.

Storm Centers

A certain tension exists between pacifist groups and other Christian bodies representing the official churches. The former insist on radical opposition to all war and decry military service and war preparations. They would replace the period of compulsory service with the colors by a period in the civil service, at least for conscientious objectors. The churches in general, being so closely connected with the life of the nations, especially those which are established churches, share the feeling of insecurity still prevailing in most countries and dare not advocate complete disarmament as long as Europe resembles the forge of Vulcan. The bogey of Bolshevism is still potent in Europe and prevents many churches from advocating general disarmament. The presence of many discontented minorities in the new states gives a certain justification for standing armies. The Franco-German problem, the Balto-Polish-Russian problem, the Balkan problem, the Eastern question, the Danzig corridor, all loom up as storm centers, any one of which may give rise to an armed conflict overnight.

This almost universal feeling of insecurity has led to a consideration of war even by the churches as an ultima ratio which may become necessary when all other attempts to preserve peace have failed. Even a theologian like W. Hermann believes in war as an unavoidable necessity as long as we have to do with human nature. Troeltsch was so convinced of the justification of the last war that he wished every one of his words might be a gun directed against the enemy. A goodly number of other theologians, such as Baumgarten, stood on sentry with the same conviction as to the justice of the war as had their French and British colleagues. They considered pacifism as the sickness of a beaten people, as defaitism, against which a sound and religious patriotism has to defend the very right and existence of the state. Their opinion was shared by the great majority of German church people, that the acknowledgment of the state includes the right of the state to make war if its supreme interests are menaced. War or no war means to them state or no state. Even pacifists like Doctor Rade are not strictly anti-militarists, but go with their people in time of need. He remarked: "It is hypocrisy to say that one is willing to support the state and to deny its right to war in the same moment."

The pacifist idea is not deeply inrooted in the minds of the Christian people throughout Continental Europe, but has found numbers of adherents not only in the neutral countries but also among the German-speaking peoples. The bleeding wounds of Germany, France, Austria, and the warring Balkan nations have not yet sufficiently healed for men to trust each other fully. Among the great powers, pacifism has made more ground in England than elsewhere. When in the Copec Conference in Birmingham a speaker defended the idea that there were some wars which were fought for right and civilization, and asked whether Lord Kitchener did not fight such a war in the Sudan, the assembly answered with an overwhelming and tremendous "No!"

Norman Angell's prophecy that any future war would cause an immense economic loss has been justified in the eyes of every one. The desire for peace is universal in Europe, but the feeling of general insecurity, the certitude that the pre-war methods of diplomacy and national egoism persist, prevent even sincere friends of international good-will from supporting without reservation the claims of ethical pacifist Christian groups.

Advocates of a more Christian international order look with regret upon the fact that Christian people throw in their lot with the nation when the interests of the state and the teachings of Christ come into conflict. In the inevitable division between Caesar and Christ, Caesar continues to triumph in the victory. Thousands of thoughtful Christians in Europe look with humiliation upon the decisions which were made in the years 1914 to 1921. It is also true that even in international good-will and reconciliation, and even in the final realization of a strong and adequate League of Nations, received a shock when the Armenian people were abandoned without the protection promised them, when powerful armies invaded foreign territories in the midst of peace and set up irritating administrations, when many of the new states, after years of experience, have refused friendly treatment to their minorities. The experience of millions in peace as well as in war is calculated to engender hatred. The Christian conscience of Europe is threatened with an unbearable dualism. On the one hand it accepts the claims of Christ for a peaceful world, and on the other it feels compelled equally to acknowledge the transgressions of this clear law by the agencies of living in nations whose security is menaced.

Friends of Peace Not Idle

Friends of peace within and without the church are not idle. The present generation, by the sufferings of four years of fighting in the field, understands more deeply than it did in time of peace the historic message of the Quakers. No other groups of the church universal have been of such transcendent spiritual help to the wounded of Europe. Here and there in every communion are groups of internationally-minded Christians who are busily working for peace and reconciliation.

Efforts within the church have largely consisted in the work of the Quakers, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Woman's International League for Peace and Freedom, in the national committees of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. The first assembly of the alliance met on a tragic day at the end of July, 1914, in Constance, to consider what Christianity should do to keep peace, but it was too late. On the very day of the conference war broke out and all further efforts were hopeless.

In 1915 the same group met in Berne for further efforts and immediately after the war the alliance convened in Holland and proved that at least for this little group of representatives of many European nations love was stronger than hatred. In the midst of a scene of almost unparalleled exaltation and humiliation, former enemies clasped each other's hands and united in the Lord's prayer. These meetings have been continued in Switzerland and Denmark. Although on more than one occasion strong antagonism between nationalist groups has sprung up, an international Christian public spirit is steadily growing. The endowments of the Church Peace Union which financed these conferences enabled a large number of Christian leaders from all churches and countries, who would never have met, to come together, foster friendly relations, and form a Christian council of peace. Doctor Ramsay, the organization secretary of the alliance, together with Sir Willoughby Dickinson and Doctor Henry Atkinson, visited all the European countries and formed and enlarged the national committees of the alliance.

A solution of many problems which rest upon the countries of Europe cannot easily or quickly be found, even when an agreement among Christians of all countries has been reported. The political influence of these groups is often too weak to change the policies which lead to conflict, especially in countries where the groups form only a small Protestant minority, as in the cases of France, Bulgaria, Italy, Jugo-Slavia, and Poland. They are confronted with the familiar question, "How can the ideal become real in a material and relative world?" Where is the point in the machinery of our social and political life where ideals become effective?

Serving the Cause of Peace

For most church leaders throughout the world, the League of Nations appears to be the most effective means for serving the cause of international peace. For the first time in history, an adequate attempt is being made to settle international conflicts in a peaceful way, and to eliminate the causes of war and effectively carry on the social and humanitarian tasks which confront all peoples. A distinguished European recently remarked: "It will remain to the everlasting merit of President Wilson to have given a body to an idea conceived long ago by illustrious minds by inserting it inseparably in the treaty of Versailles."

As this treaty was considered by the Germans as a Friedensdiktat and not as a genuine peace treaty, the league so inextricably woven into the treaty has found many obstacles in its way. As the last few nations finally come within its ranks, it will achieve a fuller measure of authority. The league has been forced to make its way slowly and this process will continue through many years to come. It has safely refuted the accusation that it is to be a super-state to which nations must yield their national prerogatives. The old world is still far from a perfect political organization. Such a union as the one contemplated by the Pan-Europa movement, headed by Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, will probably never come to pass now that the League of Nations is in existence.

As the result of the teaching of illuminated groups on the social and international significance of Christ's teaching, both within and without the church, organizations are springing up in Europe to combat war with debate and persuasion. To combat this movement the authorities in many sections have forbidden open discussion of pacifist news. Certainly no other generation has seen such widespread philosophical questioning regarding man's right to make war against his neighbor.

Putting on graceful and impressive vestments will not add sanctity to public worship unless those who wear them seem to have an exalted conception of the sanctity of their office.

Compulsory Military Training

"There are only two causes of war: inadequate world organization and unwillingness to use legal substitutes for war."

By LUCIA AMES MEAD

THE prime question in the discussion of military training is whether or not it shall be compulsory. The opposition to compulsory training, so overwhelmingly expressed at the College of the City of New York, at Wisconsin and Ohio universities and by students elsewhere, was a protest solely against a compulsion that does not exist in any land, so far as I know, except in Australia and Japan. This protest is fast spreading and the matter is becoming a burning question on which the public should be informed. No one can properly deal with the question who is not informed regarding the physical benefits of military training as contrasted with purely physical training and with the arguments for and against the need of compulsory military training to aid in national defense.

In regard to the latter, Secretary Hughes said: "So far as we can see into the future, the United States is not in the slightest danger of aggression. In no power and in no possible combination of powers lies any menace to our security." He spoke as a statesman, aware of what the premiers are saying, the parliaments voting and the financial adventurers planning. The average military man who is busy playing "war games," thinking in terms of enemies and submarines and tanks, is not a statesman and knows little about substitutes for war. He is a technician, understanding the art and science of war but not the philosophy of it. He almost invariably attributes war to greed and selfishness which will persist, and therefore he concludes war will persist. He confounds disputes which individuals, states and nations are bound to have indefinitely, with war. There are endless causes of disputes, but they need not be settled by explosives. There are only two causes of war: inadequate world organization and unwillingness to use legal substitutes for war.

Steps Toward Peace

The nations of Europe are planning a conference on disarmament. Russia has cut her army down one-half since 1913. Germany, perforce, has cut hers down to one-eighth; France has reduced hers and is now about to cut down her home army in peace times from 450,000 to 300,000 and to reduce the term of service from eighteen months to a year. Fifty-five nations, by joining in the League of Nations, have gone a long way toward insuring peace, and France and Germany have ended their ancient hostility at Locarno. Europe is leading the world toward peace, but America is loath to pledge herself to any measure that will make her surrender her right to go to war if she pleases. Our aloofness is largely responsible for the unwillingness of the British empire to endorse the Geneva protocol.

Does national defense require the compulsory training of American youth to arms in a country that is the safest in the world? No other nation has our resources or has a great ocean on each side. Our Canadian frontier of 3000 miles, absolutely unguarded, is the safest borderline in the world. We can feed ourselves, as Great Britain cannot. No nation ever declared war against us, yet we insist on having a navy as large as Great Britain's though the British empire has twice our coast line to defend. Our country is no longer in the vanguard as she was for a century in leading the world to peace.

The cause of this is largely due to popular ignorance of the facts. How many know that in all our foreign wars combined we have lost fewer in battle with foreigners than we have had murdered in the last ten years? The multitude imagines that we have had rivers of blood shed by foreigners. One of the prominent women of Massachusetts guessed that the number slain by them was 6,000,000, though it was fewer than 100,000 for all five wars combined. All these facts have a serious bearing on the question whether taxpayers want to keep a dozen or more army officers in each of the eighty-three colleges where there is compulsory training. These teach a subject that has little bearing on anything that most students are preparing for and on which many object to spending time. Why not equally well compel every one to study mechanics, mining or medicine, which would be of more general value to the country in defending us against real dangers?

Three to One

As it takes the equivalent of three men's entire time in war to feed, clothe, equip, train and transport one soldier, the futility from a defense point of view of training every youth at which the war department aims is apparent. Said Congressman Mondell: "A system of universal compulsory military training could not be inaugurated in America and operated for the first year for less than one billion dollars and could not be carried on thereafter for less than seven hundred million dollars per annum and these figures are conservative." In his pamphlet on "Military Training in Schools and Colleges" which is having wide circulation, Mr. Winthrop D. Lane says: "In 1915 there were no summer camps and only 119 officers detailed to military schools; in 1920, we had a national defense act legalizing a drive on civil institutions." Last year congress devoted almost six million dollars for military training in schools and colleges and camps and assigned 1832 officers and enlisted men to carry on the training.

As an illustration of the present situation in a civilian institution which receives about $20,000 from the government under the Morrill Act of 1862, the following facts are interesting. The Massachusetts Institute of Technology which has compulsory training for the first two years, gives military instruction to 1100 during these years and to 415 who elect it during the last two years. The latter receive thirty cents a day every day including vacations until the end of the senior year and seventy cents a day during the six weeks at summer camps together with free transportation. The staff of history and English is seventeen, as against eighty in military science. Different colleges announce that students may expect from $187 to $250 above expenses when they elect military training. This is a great inducement to an indigent student. There is an impression that the federal government makes military training compulsory in colleges which have a federal grant under the Morrill Act; but by the decision of the government authorities this was decided not to be so. The land grant colleges must provide military training by acceptance of it on the part of students is optional so far as the government is concerned. The compulsory comes from the trustees.

What is the physical value of military training for adolescents? General Leonard Wood is quoted: "Personally, I do not believe that we should give the training before the nineteenth year." Col. Thomas F. Edward said: "The modern drill regulations are by no means adapted for use in schools under any circumstances." Germany gave no military training before the nineteenth year. Dr. Dudley A. Sargent, for years the head of the Harvard gymnasium and a leading expert in physical training, condemned military training, as such, as inferior to proper physical training. After stating seven requisites regarding the coordination of muscles, rapidity of movement, respiration, etc., he said: "My principal objection to military drill as a physical exercise is that it does not to any extent meet the physiological demands of the body as set forth in the seven observations just referred to... After taking the most favorable view possible of military drill as a physical exercise, we are led to conclude that its constrained positions and closely localized movements do not afford the essential requisites for developing muscles and improving the respiration and circulation and thereby improving the general health and condition of the system. We must further conclude that in case of any malformation, local weakness or constitutional debility the drill tends, by its strain upon the nerves and prolonged tension on the muscles, to increase the defects rather than to relieve them."

There is everything to be said for universal physical training, especially with such careful attention to each youth that physical defects may be corrected, so that no such disgraceful showing of incompetents as the draft of 1917 showed can occur in the next generation. If, in addition to what physical training now exists, the time and money spent on military training were added to it, would not the results for peace and war be far greater? The state of New York, like the city of Cleveland, for years had compulsory military training which both have dropped to substitute purely physical training.

The Quest for a City

"For he looked for a city."—Hebrews 11:10.

By F. C. WHITE

THIS epistle was addressed to Christian Jews, who had left the church of their fathers and joined the fellowship of believers in Jesus. Like Abraham, they had come out in faith, not knowing what lay before them, except that God had promised them, as he had promised Abraham, an inheritance.

Now Abraham spent his days as a sojourner in the land of promise, because, we are told, he was looking for a city. He could, of course, have found one of a sort, as Lot did; but he was looking for something different, a city whose builder and maker is God.

We are all travelers in search of a city. It is interesting to notice how what we call the wanderlust seems to be innate. As children we love exploring, and tales of discovery never fail to appeal to us. As grown-ups the love of wandering does not leave us. Those who can travel do so. Those who cannot, dream of it.

With this instinct for wandering goes the fascination of the city. Travel, for the sake of travel, is a modern characteristic. Of old, men journeyed in order to arrive, and their goal was usually a city. The instinct for a city is there because God put it there. It is his ideal for man. The Bible, as has often been said, begins with a garden, but ends with a city.

It is these two things, the impulse to journey and the search for a city, that constitute pilgrimage. We are all pilgrims, and, because we are looking for a city that will realize the ideal God has put in our hearts, we are never satisfied. It is well we are not. The man who becomes satisfied with the things of time has brought his pilgrimage to an end without having arrived. To those who have the city of God in their hearts, the cities of men are the source of disappointment and sorrow.

Does this mean that the search for the city here is futile; that all our effort to realize the ideal here is but a mirage of the spirit? No. For in seeking the city we find and fulfil our destiny. We are not only pilgrims, we are soldiers, we are knights-errant. Here we have no abiding city, but that does not mean we have no concern with the scene of our pilgrimage. The vision of the city which hath foundations must not only lure our souls but fire our hearts, so that all around us which denies that vision shall challenge not only our faith, but our interference where things are wrong. We must seek to put them right, in the name of Jesus and as citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem. To wash our hands of the world's wrongs is to betray our trust. If we are false to our light we shall miss the city, for the kingdom is within us, and if we betray it, we lose it.

—British Times.

"A Brief Study of the Sacraments," by Rev. T. M. McConnell, D.D., appears in the Presbyterian of the South. Concerning baptism he says: "The root idea of circumcision, the other Old Testament sacrament, was separation. It was the badge, or mark, showing that those who received it were separated from the nations, and set apart to the service of God; and so it was just as appropriate for Isaac, when he was a week old, as for Ishmael when he was thirteen years of age, or Abraham when ninety-nine. On the day of Pentecost, in answer to the question as to what relation their children would sustain to God under the new dispensation, Peter says 'the promise is unto you and to your children and to all that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call.' The children of believing parents, whether Jews or Gentiles, are thus declared to be 'heirs of the promise' given to Abraham in the original charter of the church. Children are included in the covenant now just as they were then, and as parties to that covenant they are entitled to its seal. Here is our reply to those who ask us to give scriptural authority for infant baptism. Luke tells us that 'those who received Peter's word were baptized.' All believers and their children were included in the covenant, and received the seal in its new form of baptism, just as Abraham and his children received it in its old form of circumcision. The root idea of baptism, then, must be the same as that of circumcision. It is the badge, or mark, showing that those who receive it are separated from the world, and set apart to the service of God; and so it is just as reasonable to baptize a baby as it is to baptize an adult. Abraham's whole family were enrolled as God's people, and no doubt whole families were also enrolled as his people on the day of Pentecost." Baptist readers will be interested to know that there are still good people who reason that way.

The Devotional Life

A Soul Consumed by Covetousness

Take heed, and beware of covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth—Luke 12:15

BY LUTHER D. GARBLE

JESUS was speaking of the things of eternal life. There came a rude interruption. One said: "Master, speak to my brother that he divide the inheritance with me." His mind was so saturated with business that the most solemn and awful words of even Jesus were heard as an idle, meaningless voice. Mark our Lord's answer. He dismissed the rude disturber with the sharp words, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you?" Turning to his disciples, Jesus said: "Take heed, and beware of covetousness. See what covetousness can do to the heart of a man. See what it has done to this man. It has consumed him heart and soul." Jesus then told them the parable of the rich fool.

Prosperity

"The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully."

Nothing of a criminal character is laid to his charge, as to the manner in which his wealth had been acquired. No extortion nor oppression, nothing unfair or dishonest is alleged against him. He was an honest, industrious, enterprising man. He had not made his money by business dodges or by speculation in stocks. His wealth had come from the soil, and surely no gain is more legitimate than this. He was an enterprising business man.

He was not content with his old unsightly storehouses. He said to himself, "I will pull down my barns and build greater." He was not one of those penurious, close-fisted creatures who are too mean to spend anything on permanent improvement of their property. Can we help thinking well of such a man? Christ draws the picture fairly; takes him at his own estimate, describes him in his own language, without prejudice.

He had finished his figuring, laid down his pencil, and with his pleasant dreams of a long future before him, he folded his arms complacantly and said: "If anybody in all this world is prosperous and to be envied, I am that man."

But listen, his ear was stunned with the words, "Thou fool!"

It was the voice of God. "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

Fool! It was the one and only name the Living God had for him. Men had called him by other names. When they spoke of him they called him the "rich man," the "successful man," the "great man."

* * * *

"This night thy soul shall be required of thee."

This night! Can it be? In the midst of his hopes and plans; with the barns unbuilt, the fields un-reaped, the figs untasted? Shall he die tonight? Must he die tonight?

Whether he bars all the doors and lies down upon his bed or whether he sits and watches, with all the house alight, or whether he tries to flee from God, will Azrael come for him tonight? And tomorrow morning will men be whispering, "He is dead. He passed away suddenly during the night"? Will all his wealth be another's tomorrow? Will another build the barns and store and spend the harvest? Oh, how that awful voice rings in his ears: "This night thy soul shall be required of thee."

"This night." The summons does not say tomorrow. That was his word. When he spoke of his plans for the future it was always tomorrow. But there is no tomorrow for him.

"This night." Ah, he had forgotten the nights in his calculations for the future. He had talked about years in whole numbers, about the bright spaces called day, but never thought of those black lines called night.

But, between today and tomorrow, brethren, there rolls the black night river, and who knows?—we may fall into it and be swept away and never stop on the radiant shore of the morning.

Therefore, the word of this book is today. Yesterday is God's. Tomorrow is God's. Today only is ours. "Today, if you will hear my voice, harden not your hearts." "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."

"Work, for the night is coming when man's work is done."

The Accounting

"This night thy soul shall be required of thee." "Tonight I shall want you." And the rich fool could not say him nay, and no more can we when God's summons comes. We can say "No" to our best friend. We can decline the invitation of our most importunate companion, but when God says, "Tonight I shall want you," we cannot sit down and write a note of excuse; we cannot plead, "Lord, let it stand over till next week." This night came the demand and this night the demand had to be met, and the soul, which after all was only a loan, was required of him.

And so ends the parable. I suppose we are all ready to say what a fool this man was to forget God, his neighbor, his soul and death and eternity!

But wait, hear what Jesus adds: "So is every one that layeth up treasure for himself and is not rich toward God."

"For what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

Wyoming Baptist Assembly

BY ELMA WORTHAM

Many of the Baptist assemblies are now over and reports are streaming in from every hand. Perhaps you would like to hear about the assembly that we Wyoming Baptists had.

Such a wonderful assembly as it was! There seemed to be no end to the fun and good times that we had, yet over it was a feeling of sacredness and sweet fellowship. It seemed as if God had breathed on us the spirit of peace and good-will.

After breakfast we gathered in the assembly hall for family devotions, after which each went to his own room for personal devotions. This started us out right with God and we all felt richly repaid for having spent a few minutes in meditation and prayer.

We had the privilege of attending classes under the instruction of some of the best trained religious workers in the country. We received helpful and useful suggestions about every phase of church work. The lectures in the various classes were wonderful. At the close of the assembly there were 115 assembly credits and about seventeen teacher training credit cards awarded.

Recreation had a large part in the assembly. A supervisor of recreation kept the good spirits of the people during the recreation hours, at meal times, and in between times. It would have done you good to see the young ladies, young men, members of the faculty and pastors from various towns play baseball as if their life depended upon it. Several times we went for a swim in an open-air plunge about six miles out of Douglas, and oh, the fun that we had! Those who didn't know how to swim soon learned.

The first Saturday afternoon we went out to the natural bridge, about fifteen miles west of Douglas, for our evening service. This was one of the most devotional and consecrated services during the entire assembly. The talks and sermon dealt with the life service question and when the call came for those who wished to give their lives in Christian service, to do whatever God might call them to do, there were about forty young people who consecrated their lives to God, to follow wheresoever he might lead them. Twenty-two of them had never taken this stand before. It seemed as if God himself had become a little nearer and dearer to us one after the other took this stand. We all be true to it.

In the evenings we had varied programs. Our assembly pastor had a wonderful message for us each evening. There were speakers from several of the different Baptist colleges, from the state university, and our worker among the Indians. One evening was given over to "Stunt Night" when every delegation gave a stunt.

There were three banquets, one for the B. Y. P. U., one for the W. W. G., and one for the Life Service League. State and national workers were present and helped make these banquets a success. Perhaps the Life Service League banquet will be remembered longest, for each new member took a letter from the words "Life Service" and told what it stood for, as "I" for "love." It was an inspiration to hear these young people as they told their stories and it is our prayer and hope that many other young people who have never become Life Service members will become so soon.

The first Sunday afternoon Cheyenne young people had charge of the program and gave an interesting report of the Los Angeles convention.

Far From Home

BY MARY COLES CARRINGTON

HOW often in these tropic nights I long to hear again

The soft, unceasing, soothing sound of gentle summer rain,

Its patter on the shingled roof, its rustle in the leaves,

Its mutter through the ancient spout that skirts the mossy eaves;

Once more to feel faint breezes steal from my lost northern skies,

The trailing fingers of the damp across my tired eyes!

Hot is the air that hovers where the punka-coolie cowers;

Heavy the scents that rise above the garden's gaudy flowers;

Harsh the poor, tethered goat's complaint—harassing, never still;

Hateful the rasping insect choir, monotonous and shrill;

In muffled beat that must repeat its message of unrest,

A tom-tom's futile rhythm mocks the throbbing in my breast.

Through the thick darkness draws a breath that had its hectic birth

Not in a cool, gray heaven, but in the hard, heat-tortured earth;

Before it happy memories fade, long-cherished visions flee,

And on its burning wings is borne a subtle dread to me,

The haunting fear that to my ear may never drift again

That soft, unceasing, soothing sound of gentle summer rain.

B. Y. P. U. gave a vivid pageant entitled "Broken China."

The last Sunday was even better attended than the week before, and our assembly pastor gave us his best inspirational message.

The total registration numbered 105 persons, seventy-four of whom attended classes regularly. This was the largest assembly ever held in Wyoming and we are looking forward to a bigger and better one next year.

Every one spoke of the inspiration received and of the determination to go home and take that inspiration along to put into practice some of the things learned.

Two Good Books

Drama in Education, by Grace Sloan Overton. New York: The Century Company.

A historical survey of drama touching upon primitive religious ceremonies in Japan, India, and Greece, liturgical, mystery, and miracle plays in the early church, with a discussion of the psychological basis, educational value, and the place of dramatic activities in the program of religious education. The more practicable part of the book is devoted to the types and technique of dramatic production. A bibliography, costume plates, a color chart, and the suggestions of available materials for plays of all kinds make this book invaluable for all who are interested in the religious use of drama.

—F. H. FAHRINGER.

The Great Partnership, by John Archibald McCallum. New York: Doran. $2 net.

God and man are partners not only in a religious but in a cosmic sense. The working out of this thesis is elaborate, metaphysical, not very logical but suggestive. The point of view is that of modern science coupled with an evangelical faith. Perhaps one quotation will best express the tenor of the book. It is this: "The restlessness and wistfulness of our age are naught but undirected longings for God as the slumbering deeps in man try to awaken at the call of the Eternal. But man's answer will be incoherent and self-contradictory until his spiritual sensibilities become acute. Then he will learn to look for God, not in the unusual and the remote but in the usual and near at hand. He will discover that there is more mystery and therefore more reason for awe and adoration in the mountains, the stars, the tides, and life itself, with its constant urge toward perfection, than in any miraculous events of the long ago." The keynote of the book, not always discernible, is "the social significance of the Fatherhood of God."

The Chimney Corner

From Glassless Windows to Libraries

"HOW EASY the women of today have it as compared with the women of a generation ago!" Every one has heard that exclamation many times. But some women thought that all women of today were not having it so much easier than the women of a couple of generations back. So the General Federation of Women's Clubs began a survey of farm-home equipment. Mary Sherman, national president of the federation, reports on this survey in the Country Gentleman, when 20,000 women had been heard from. Here are a few paragraphs from the interesting report:

Living, as most of you do, in comfort, it would bring tears to your eyes to read some of the replies to the questions on the work sheets.

Surely there is need of a standard of farm-home equipment when in response to the question, "What labor-saving devices do you have in your kitchen?" one answers, "A bucket and a dipper," another, "Some linoleum," another, "A sausage grinder," another, "A folding ironing board." Even screens, that seem so indispensable for cleanliness, health and comfort, are by no means universal. Not a few women report that they have "pieces of screens" or only a few windows screened.

From one locality in Florida comes word that not more than 1 per cent of the homes are screened. Wrote one farm woman: "All my life I have wanted to get breakfast without flies to bother me, and now I can, since the kitchen is screened."

Here, showing the dark side of the picture, conditions are primitive; as for conveniences, they do not exist.

A survey of this community showed one farmhouse that boasted a pump; open wells supplied the water at all the rest. Water is carried to the house by the farm women, either from the well or from a spring or creek. It is a hard, back-breaking chore, with steep steps to climb into the kitchens.

Every home has its open fireplace and its wood-burning stove for cooking. Pine is the common fuel; the rooms are smoke laden and the objects they contain are covered with soot.

In not a few instances the open fireplace furnishes the sole means of illumination at night; the home maker does not possess even an oil lamp. There are houses where board blinds take the place of glass windows. One home was noted that did not have a single window; it had only doors.

When ironing day comes many of the women heat their sadirons in the fireplace. There are no sewing machines, but sausage grinders are fairly common. Two iceless refrigerators were the total for the entire county.

These are conditions at lowest ebb, but from other sections of the country come stories that show much is still to be desired in the way of home equipment on many farms.

Writes a woman from the cut-over section of Wisconsin: "Only one other house in the neighborhood has water in the kitchen. The drinking water is hauled in barrels. Linoleum on the kitchen floor is a luxury. Most women are thankful if they have matched flooring instead of rough boards. Some do not have enough dishes to set table with the barest simplicity. The men have tools and machinery, but from their point of view if the wife has a kettle and a skillet or two, she has too much.

"A telephone is a luxury in these parts, not a necessity. There is no way to run a vacuum cleaner; an electric-light plant is too expensive. The question is not what I want for my house and my work, but what can I coax and argue my husband into buying, and what can he afford to pay for? Conditions are not going to become better until women have a little more say as to what is done with the money that comes in to the farm."

The letters I am receiving from all parts of the country encourage me and renew my determination to carry this survey to its fruition. "I am praying and working for the time to come when we can have improvements on the farms," writes a Texas housewife. "I think you are a God-sent woman to start such a plan."

It must be borne in mind that an aspect of relativity enters into this problem of labor-saving devices. A screened kitchen may represent the acme of home equipment to the woman who has been struggling against flies, and the wife who has been hauling water from a well might ask no greater boon than a cistern. But her sister who has water piped to her sink might regard electric power for illumination, for running a washing machine, a vacuum cleaner and an iron as the utmost in convenience.

Witness, then, this letter from an Indiana woman: "We are all most keenly interested in the question as to our distance from an electric-transmission line, hoping the federation may be able to do something toward opening these high-tension lines to farms along the way. If that ever happens rural life will be revolutionized."

Or this communication from Maine: "One of our greatest needs is better library facilities. We have a traveling library now and some of our club members belong to a fiction library eight miles away."

It is a far cry from the farm home with glassless windows to the one that aspires to better library facilities.

You must not get the idea that the American farm home is totally lacking in conveniences or labor-saving equipment. I have merely cited these instances, as shown by the survey to date, to demonstrate how far below a reasonable minimum some communities are and to emphasize the necessity of finding a standard of some kind. The survey shows that in many rural sections running water, indoor toilets, coal ranges, screens and other conveniences are the rule rather than the exception.

The Small Egotist

STUDYING the vocabulary of the child of five years, to work out a new primer, Chicago kindergartens find that the most frequently used word is "I." It is used nearly twice as often at this age as "the." "Mother" comes twenty-fourth on the list, and "father" eighth. "What," as might be expected is prominent, in thirteenth place.

There is a lot of psychology in that list. Nothing reveals the mind more than speech. The young child is a dreadful little egotist above everything else. Which need not be held against the child. He has to put himself first, to get his needs attended to, and to survive.

A large part of education consists in rooting out that "I." As the child grows in civilization, he becomes more conscious of himself but learns to assert himself less offensively. Eventually, as he attains family consciousness and social consciousness, he learns to say "we."

The Sabbath Rest

"DO I get a rest on Sunday?" a housewife complained. "Do I? All Saturday afternoon I get food ready for the family's motor outing Sunday. I'm up early on the Sabbath packing the food and the children. The day is spent on the road or along the creek banks, fighting flies and bugs and insects, keeping the children out of trouble and fights, unpacking the food, repacking the baskets. Home in the evening, chigger bitten, dirty, tired, children cross, sleepy and filthy. Do I get a rest on Sunday? I pray every Saturday night for rain."

But the same Power that can send rain in answer to a petition can convert the hearts of every member of the family, so that the Sunday will be spent in quiet worship. Why not, then, pray for this instead of for rain? Rain every Sunday is really quite inconvenient for many people.

BOYS and Girls

Dopshun in Search of a Mother

BY MARGARET T. APPLGARTH

DOPSHUN of course knows all about it. Certainly there had been opportunities enough to discover the truth about how anybody gets a mother. Dopshun tells it is this way: just outside the gates are hundreds and thousands of ladies, none of them very desirable as mothers, and others much too scarey or cross. Several times every month these ladies might be seen trickling through the gates one at a time, some in the morning, some in the afternoon; some in automobiles, some on foot; but all equal-eager to be mothers to somebody.

Dopshun has never been quite sure what happens in the office. That office must have been a singularly blind and dark place, for from it those ladies would emerge with their minds fully made up as to the particular children suitable for them to be mothers to. Sometimes they even had a little list—not always on paper, you understand," Dopshun explained, "but just a little list lying around loose in their heads." The minute their eyes lighted on Alma Olafson, for instance, they would say to Keys: "Is this the little red-headed girl you spoke of?"

And Keys would nod, with every key on her big fat waist jingling a different tune. Or there would be Suzanne Clarisse or Margarita to be hunted up and played, or even Fatima. Yes, even Fatima, that curious little dumpling of a girl who spoke no English, but could smile and dimple in five other languages. It was only natural, therefore, that Dopshun should begin planning her own mother. She, too, made a little list to lie around in her head: An automobile-mother! A fur-coat-mother! A husband-mother, for Dopshun said the ladies who brought husbands could make up their minds much quicker.

Once in a while, when a lady would come through the gates and disappear into the office, Dopshun would feel something so queer in her bones that she would loiter eagerly nearby: "Dear me, dear me, that's going to be my mother! I just know it!"

Thelma got one of Dopshun's mothers. Suzanne Clarisse got another. Even the dark Fatima got one. There seemed to be no trick at all about it, and yet always, somehow or other, Dopshun missed out completely. Nobody so much as looked at her. It began to be spoken of by the other orphans. Swedish children got adopted; German children got adopted; even funny little Turks; but Dopshun simply couldn't manage it. Dopshun felt this deeply as the truth dawned on her; she decided she wasn't getting recommended properly in the office. Keys was not enough her friend. If this kept up she would be one of those dismal orphans who stayed on forever and ever. Something would have to be done, and Dopshun tried to do it, but at seven and three-quarters one has not a great deal of ingenuity in such difficult matters. But she did write a letter to Keys:

"Dear Miss Rubby Agnes Smith, Matron. I am ready four dopshun any time now please and wood lick a nice one soon from your lovigly Magnhild Gretchen Schlossel."

It was at this time that she spoke of "dopshun" so constantly that the children nicknamed her as a matter of course. But neither the letter nor the new name seemed to bring results. Ladies still came through the gates; they still disappeared into the office; Keys still introduced them to this one or that; and this one or that would prove satisfactory enough to be whisked off, while Dopshun lingered.

She began to look in the mirror. It was noses! Undoubtedly. Hers was too—well, too sudden. It jutted! To get oneself adopted noses had far better be little and round not to get in the way of kisses. But noses were another stiff problem, for how could one reduce them? Of course she could, and she did, lie on her nose all night, to round off the peak, as it were. It was provoking to wake up in the morning, on her side, with the same familiar peak jutting out.

And then there was hair. Experience soon showed her that it was the curly-haired who got mothers quickest. With newspaper curlers Dopshun worked such unspeakable magic overnight that she was horrified at her appearance.

"Dear Jesus," she prayed, "it's little Magnhild Schlossel praying. Won't you please tell God if it's my nose that's wrong I would like it a wee bit shorter at the end, and if it's my hair couldn't you please send some one who likes it straight? Amen."

The days marched on. No matter. It was then that the scrapbook became her one solace. Every one had to make scrapbooks. They were the thing called Social Service. They were sent to those "children worse off than ourselves." And it was great fun, rummaging through magazines, snipping, pasting, hurrying merrily along from picture to picture, hit or miss. But Dopshun did not hurry. Neither was there anything hit or miss. A soap advertisement?—because a mother was washing her baby. Tooth paste?—two rows of small white teeth, with a mother superintending the vigorous up-and-down brushing. Oatmeal?—a mother placing a steaming breakfast bowl in front of a ravenous infant. Raisins?—a mother seeing to it that her child got its iron daily. Stockings?—a mother watching a tom-boy daughter climb a tree: "Ours Don't Rip." Dopshun dillied and dallied, seeing herself in every picture until it was much too intimate to part with. Not even for Social Service, spelled in capitals; not even for those dear "children worse off than ourselves" in hospitals. For what was a broken bone, more or less, reasoned Dopshun wistfully, if there were a mother in the offing somewhere, to worry, to pet, to love. Did she have any one to worry, or pet, or love her? No; but she had all these precious pictures of the way things would be if she had some one. So the book was like a prayer book to her. She hid it under her pillow at night secretly, and the fatter it grew the more she liked feeling the uncomfortable little edges poking into her cheekbones. "Mother!" she would whisper to all the pictures.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

MEETING OF THE BOARD

The Board of Missionary Cooperation will hold a meeting in Chicago at 2 p. m. Wednesday, Sept. 29. Conferences on the budget for 1927-28 will be held in connection with the meeting.

NEBRASKA IS STARTING WELL

In Nebraska this year the churches have been asked to make their own quotas in the light of their present ability, with the record of their past giving and the statement of present need before them. The latest issue of the Nebraska bulletin says, "We are rejoicing in the response so far given."

PROGRESS IN THE SUMMER

Rev. Warren L. Steeves came to the Walnut Street church, Waterloo, Iowa, this summer, with no intention of allowing the work to dwindle during the summer months. In spite of the hot weather, the congregations have been splendid each Sunday at both services. There have been a number of baptisms, and the financial work of the church is strong. July was the largest in the way of money and collections for over a period of nine years.

SEND FOR SAMPLE

CUT BOOKS

Several weeks ago, a notice appeared on this page saying that there were a number of cuts available in the publicity office of the Board of Missionary Cooperation which could suitably be used in local church calendars. A number of requests have come in for these cuts, the two most recent being from the Baptist church of Anderson, Ind., and from Rev. C. Aaron King, pastor of the First church of Tulare, Calif.

In order to make easier the selection of these cuts, three or four booklets have been prepared showing prints. One of these will be sent on request to any pastor or church bulletin editor who would like to see it.

CHILDREN'S SERMONS

The Baptist church in Novi, Mich., has found helpful the institution of a children's service. At the time when the pastor, Rev. R. O. Thompson, is conducting the main preaching services in the church auditorium, separate junior church services are held in another room under the direction of the pastor's wife, who preaches a children's sermon. The children being out of the main auditorium, the parents can give their undivided attention to the sermons, and then, too, the children are getting a sermon particularly adapted to their minds.

The above item is taken from a leaflet just issued by the literature division of the board of Missionary Cooperation. It is called "What Some Rural Pastors Are Doing" and gives in detail a number of methods by which various pastors in rural communities have built up their churches. It should prove especially interesting and helpful to the rural pastor, but some of the ideas may also be adaptable to a city pastorate. The leaflet may be obtained for 10 cents from any of the literature bureaus.

IT'S BEING DONE

The "Michigan Baptist" reports that the Hillsdale College church in that state, Rev. Earl F. Adams, pastor, has accepted a quota of $1500 for missions, and is sending one-twelfth every month to the state office.

A COMMUNITY VACATION

BIBLE SCHOOL

The churches of Kokomo, Ind., experimented this summer in a community vacation school, or schools, for there were four in different sections of the city. The pastor of the Baptist church, Rev. Wesley P. Pearce, was selected to supervise this work because of his success in his own local school in former years.

Twenty-eight teachers were employed. These were mostly public school teachers, as a high standard both intellectually and spiritually, was demanded. No craft work was given but instead educational films were shown for twenty minutes each day.

Forty-three churches were represented by the pupils enrolled. A child to be regularly enrolled had to attend three days. The total enrolment in the four schools was 1289 with an average daily attendance of 787 children. The missionary offering amounted to $58 which was given to the campaign to provide Testaments for the Chinese. A thank offering of $71.10 was given by the parents. The churches were apportioned an amount to cover the expense of the movement.

The ministerial association was highly pleased with this first community school and as an experiment it was felt to be a real success. Two and a half hours each day were given to Bible teaching, and the commencement exercises, held in the high school auditorium, were largely attended by interested parents and citizens.

MAKING AN ANNUAL MEETING ATTRACTIVE

Rev. S. B. Crandall, pastor of the First church of Battle Creek, Mich., has for some years asked every department of the church work, every organization within the church, and every officer, to present their annual reports in the form of a poster. This year, at the annual meeting, there were twenty-nine posters, some of them quite artistically made up, each giving the main facts of the year's work. When the reports are presented, the posters are exhibited and then are kept for further inspection by church members.

DOLLAR METER USED

TO TAKE OFFERING

A unique method of taking an offering was devised by Pastor Nyland of the Pearl Street church of Bridgeton, N. J. It was decided to hold a special offering on Sunday, June 27, in order to provide for financial needs of the church during the vacation period, and the following method was used.

The pastor constructed a dollar meter made from an old wash-boiler which did its work if a proper coin (in this instance a silver dollar) was inserted. A gauge attached to the meter kept the congregation advised of the progress of receipts. The idea was so popular that a representative from another Sunday school asked permission to use the meter, hoping to raise money for repairs.

PASTOR ENDORSES PLAN

A small church in New Jersey was recently assisted to put on an every-member plan by one of the field workers of the Board of Missionary Cooperation. On Aug. 1, the pastor wrote an enthusiastic letter to the field worker telling of the good results which had accrued to the church from its use. Among other things, he said that church attendance had been stimulated, there were now twenty-eight new subscribers to current expenses and missions, and the church budgets for each purpose had been increased. The pastor's own salary was raised, and six new members await baptism, three as a direct result of the plan. The pastor says in his letter:

"I have heard some say that the plan has been of more value than an evangelistic campaign. Its effects were seen in the Sunday school and also in the church vacation school which we closed Friday. I am for it."

Among Ourselves

A British Causerie

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

The Churches and the Strike

WE ARE IN the midst of a clash of opinion on the action of the Christian churches with regard to the coal strike. A group of eminent men, among them was the bishop of Birmingham, one of our most distinguished scientists, issued a statement urging that a certain course of action should be taken, a "definite" Christian action which would give a pause which was so necessary to a better understanding. It set forth no political or economic views, but it urged that that was entirely in keeping with the spirit of Christ. This action was welcomed by church people generally and by the more liberal press of the country. By the conservative press and the government it was resented, as a case of impertinent "interference." The labor organizations have for the most part welcomed it. One of the labor leaders, known for his hostility to organized religion, openly declared that his action on the part of church leaders had completely changed his mind toward the churches. It is not surprising that one of the world who own no allegiance to Jesus Christ should resent the action of church leaders, but that professed Christians should regard as an "interference" any attempt to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to the present situation, is amazing.

"Interfering Parsons"

Most amazing of all is the action of Dean Inge in opposing his brethren by writing an article in a Sunday paper on "Interfering Parsons." The dean is an old man. Of his cleverness in certain directions there can be no doubt. He is a philosopher first and foremost, and, like many philosophers, far removed from actual life. He has had no struggle with poverty. He has lived all his life under the shelter of school, university, and cathedral. He views life through conservative glasses. He has betrayed the least sympathy with working classes, or with democracy. He tells us frankly that he does not live in progress. Often he dips his pen in acid and sends forth his word to sting. It is this unsympathetic attitude in him that is so regrettable. If in his philosophical writings he has found the way for the better understanding of religion, by his incursions into political and social affairs he has annoyed many. It would have been better had he stood by his brethren in their effort to secure justice for the oppressed, and an honorable settlement of the coal dispute.

The antagonism to the church effort at reconciliation has made it clear that membership of the state church does not necessarily carry with it sympathy with the ideals of Christ. For the majority of those who have criticized the reconcilers are "good churchmen" who are also good conservatives. They have subserved their religion to their politics. Thank God there are noble exceptions, men to whom the kingdom of God comes first. Posterity will not applaud comfortable deans and others who enjoy fat livings and speak unsympathetic words from the security of their well stocked preserves. The verdict will go to men who care nothing for party but everything for men. I wish that Dean Inge had a little less acid and a little more sweetness in his make up.

Church and State

Prominent members of the Anglo Catholic party are reviving the cry for disestablishment and are asking why free churchmen are so languid over the matter. They think that we have fallen under the influence of the bishop of Durham and have come to believe that the state church is the best bulwark against the Catholic advance. In this opinion they are wrong. There is certainly less open enthusiasm for disestablishment than there was, but this is due to a general religious apathy rather than to a belief that the church as by law established guarantees the preaching of Protestant doctrines. As a fact, the state church has definitely ceased to be Protestant in anything but name. I was in Lewes last week and for the first time saw the notice in any Anglican church: "Official Church." All official ceremonies are held here. Yet this church which is Protestant by law established was indistinguishable from a Roman church in all its appointments. The communion service was described on the notice board as "Mass." The altar was Roman in all its furniture. A red light burned before the sacrament, and the church reeked of incense. Yet nobody protests. The English people do not yet realize that the state church has been captured by the Catholic party the members of which sign the thirty-nine articles and then go forth to deny them. The separation of church and state is necessary since there is now no pretence that it is Protestant, and the state recognizes no church officially save the Protestant one. Disestablishment would not check the growth of the Catholic movement, but it would save the nation from hypocrisy by delivering us from playing with words.

Apart from this aspect of the matter however, disestablishment should come up again for consideration. State churches are disappearing all over the world. It is being realized increasingly that in the present condition of the world and of the church no one society can represent the nation. What was possible when the nation was small and there was only one religious authority is not possible when the nation is great and Christendom is divided. Then there is the social aspect of the matter. The officials of a state church are, by virtue of their office, raised to a social status which is denied to others and which is sometimes made to operate against others. A bishop, for instance, becomes a "Lord" and sits in the upper chamber. He is raised to a social rank in virtue of his religion and for no other reason. Further, at times of national expression on the religious side the officials of one body alone can take part, although they may represent a minority of the nation. For all reasons it is desirable that the church and the state should be apart. Mainly we should say because the kingdom of Christ is not of this world, and to make it a state department is to imperil its spiritual character. It is this aspect of the matter, strange to say, that appeals chiefly to free churchmen and to those Anglo Catholics who are pressing for disestablishment. Here two opposites come together.

The Youth of the World

At Helsinki, the capital of Finland, a remarkable conference has been held. It was called by the Y. M. C. A. to consider ways and means of capturing the youth of the world for Christ. Preparations for the conference have been going on for more than two years in the sending out of a questionnaire far and wide

Undergirding

Philippians 2:12-13

BY MARY W. VASSAR

I HAVE a heavy task ahead, to work my own salvation out, I labor with a load of fear, of pride, and selfishness and doubt; A strong arm seems to lift me on, and fear and weariness have flown; I but work out what God works in, my will and deed are his alone.

I have a citadel to keep, the castle of my heart and mind, I struggle with conflicting views, with prejudice and scruples blind, Baffled, bewildered, almost spent—Hush! for the clashing voices cease, And while I rest there paces guard the white-winged sentry of God's peace.

I have a life-long race to run, the goal seems dim and far-away, If I should slip, if I should fall, if I should wander wide astray! Let me but feel thy hand, my Lord, to thy dear smile I lift my eyes, I press ahead in confidence, since thou art course and goal and prize.

with a view to discovering what youth is thinking about the things that really matter. The replies to this questionnaire formed the basis of the conference. Thousands of documents from all over the world were sifted and classified, with the result that we know now fairly well what ideas are fermenting in the minds of youth.

The international character of the inquiry was a distinct advantage. It showed that there is a common denominator belonging to youth everywhere, something that transcends all national and domestic questions, and deals with life itself. Such questions as sex, vocation, sport, religion, the church and the meaning of Christ for the youth of today, were foremost. The remarkable thing is that the first named of these fills the largest place in the minds of youth. Next to that is the question of the church and personal religion. I have not space to dwell upon the conference itself, but it is essential that when the volume containing the addresses and findings is published it should be carefully read. It will prove to be perhaps the greatest illumination we have had for many years. Doctor Mott was right when he said that a greater door was open today than ever to the mind and heart of youth. The great war blasted much illusion and left men face to face with the naked realities of life. They have not yet adjusted themselves to the new way, hence the confusion and restlessness everywhere apparent. But what a chance for the church!

Preparing the Way of the Lord

Baptists are embarking upon a great intensive work this coming fall and winter. They are not out upon a money-raising campaign so much as a crusade in the interests of a deeper spirituality within their own churches and a more aggressive evangelism in the world without. A day of prayer has been set apart to be held in October when the council of the Baptist Union will meet in special session to wait upon God and when every church will be expected to devote itself to this solemn work. I am sure this move is right. We are beginning at the right place and in the right way. For too long the churches—our own and others—have been marking time. There has been no shout of a king in our camp. The music has been low. Faith has not been keenly alive. The apostolic fire has died down. Our most tremendous need is that of a genuine revival. I do not think we are keen on organizing great mass meetings. These are suspected because of the reactions which have followed them in times past. But we are keen on seeking to bring to full efficiency the life and powers of the churches themselves. When the churches are fully inspired by the experienced presence of Christ all the rest will follow easily.

Chicago Letter

By C. T. HOLMAN
Collingwood, Ontario

IN THIS lovely and quiet Georgian Bay town, Chicago seems far away and a bit unreal. Here the real things seem to be the glory of gold and crimson in the sky and the reflected wonder of it all as the sun sinks to rest across the bay, the ever-changing beauty of Blue mountain a few miles distant, and the cool, inviting shadows of pine and spruce woods. But I suppose that all this time the crowds still surge across State and Madison, the university enrolls its largest student body of any quarter, and the Baptists of Chicago carry on. But how I, two months removed from the scene, can say anything about it, is the puzzle. My best line, perhaps, will be a little chatter about this country and some ancient history from Chicago.

Modernists and Fundamentalists

"Daddy, is he a modernist or a fundamentalist?" my ten-year-old boy has demanded in a loud and insistent whisper during every sermon we have listened to together this summer. Where he gets his information about the modernist-fundamentalist row I do not know. He hears little of it around our table. I have not always found it easy to classify the preachers on the basis he requires. Most of them seem to me just to be preaching the gospel. I wish that my boy—and a good many others—would not insist on this labeling of ministers by party names. But my boy is not the only person in Canada interested in making this classification. I have just finished reading Rufus Jones' new book, "The Church's Debt to Heretics" and, by comparison with this modern crusade, I am amazed at the Roman Catholic church's restraint in its dealings with heretics.

The United Church of Canada

Last Sunday evening I had the privilege of preaching to a great congregation at a union service of Baptists and the United church of Canada. From all that I learn this experiment in organic union on the part of Methodists, Presbyterians and Congregationalists, is making splendid progress. I have read articles and heard reports on the progress within the governing bodies, but now I have had an opportunity to see how it goes in local congregations. I think it can be said that these local groups are learning how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity whatever may be their individual views on God's sovereignty or man's freedom. They are worshiping and working together in fine accord. The one lamentable feature is the bitterness which, in many places, has developed between the Presbyterians who went into the union (the great majority) and the continuing Presbyterians who propose to carry on independently. In some cases diplomatic relations have been entirely broken off. Former friends and fellow church-members will not trade with each other. It is unfortunate that this bitterness should accompany an effort toward Christian unity. But then, churches made up of human beings. Time will do its work. The continuing Presbyterians perhaps have their witness to give. Meanwhile a great united church have an opportunity to demonstrate whether or not it can make ethical and religious sanctions more effective in personal and social life than was possible to Protestantism in its former divided state.

School for City Church Workers

Before leaving Chicago I participated in the interdenominational school for city church workers conducted by the Congregational, Methodist, Disciples, Presbyterian and Baptist auspices, the Garrett Biblical Institute, Evansville, June 14-25. The school brought together a significant group of practical workers in various types of city community representatives of home mission, administrative bodies, and technical experts. Among those who lead discussions were Dr. Wm. P. Shriver, director of the department of city, immigrant and industrial work of the Presbyterian church; Dr. Paul Fox, director of interdenominational Polish work in Chicago and lecturer on anthropology and racial backgrounds in Garrett; Mrs. Edna Ells, formerly head worker in Garibaldi institute; Prof. Frank O. Beck, director of city field work at Garrett, Protestant counsellor in the boys' branch of the municipal court, Chicago. My job was to lead the discussions "Pastoral Problems in the City Community" and I learned much from a group of pastors who were actually wrestling with these problems in several different cities. Two broadly cultural courses were offered, one by Prof. E. Ames of the University of Chicago, "The Idea of God," and the other by Prof. W. T. Willett, also of that university, on, "The Old Testament in the Light of Today." The group did not confine itself to lectures and discussions but visited and studied various types of communities and the agencies operating within them: Hull house, Garibaldi institute, Olivet Institutional church, the black belt, etc.

During part of the time the school was in session the Methodist Federation of Social Service was also holding a conference in Garrett on, "The Preacher and the Economic Order." This provided an opportunity for the students to hear a to meet at luncheon conferences such as Bishop F. J. McConnell, Pr. Harry F. Ward, Rev. F. Ernest Johns and others. It was a rich and awakening experience. The one regret I feel is that although the Baptists were officially represented by one of their executive officers in formulating plans for the school, they fell down completely in providing their quota of students. As the other cooperating denominations were well represented. It would have meant, I am persuaded, a widening of the horizon and a real increase of power.

The Winona Bible Conference

By M. A. MARTIN

THE thirty-second annual Bible conference held at Winona lake, Indiana, closed Sunday evening, Aug. 22. The program included such prominent men as Dr. George W. Taft, who presided at number of the meetings, Dr. H. Tyden Chivers, pastor of Spurgeon Tabernacle, London; Dr. J. C. Massee, Boston; Dr. L. R. Scarborough, Baptist Theological seminary, Texas; Prof. A. T. Robertson, Baptist Theological seminary, Louisville, Ky.; Dr. M. E. Dodd, pastor of the Baptist church in Shreveport, La.; Dr. Robert Harper, Baptist medical missionary from Burma; E. O. Sellers, the noted song leader, with hosts of Baptist ministers from various states. All of these mighty men of God brought great messages.

The attendance this year was the largest in the history of Winona. Almost every state was represented, and missionaries came from almost every field, both at home and abroad. The missionary hour was held daily from 3-4 p.m., with two speakers during the hour. Each evening at 9:15 thirty minutes were devoted to stereopticon slides and motion pictures illustrating missionary work in various fields. People crowded these meetings. Many got a new view of missionary activities and will go home to their churches to do a greater work.

The large attendance was not the only criterion. A minister who was here for the first time said: "I am thankful that God permitted me to be at Winona where Christ was the center of every sermon and address. I received great benefit from the Bible teaching of Miss Grace Saxe. The music was wonderful. Homer Rodeheaver is a great leader. It was easy for men to preach after the preparation by this prince of sacred song leaders. Although I cannot sing, I attended the song service each afternoon by Mr. Rodeheaver and received splendid instruction to carry to my young people." Another minister said, "I have attended thirty of the thirty-two Bible conferences held at Winona, and I regard this one as the greatest by far. I believe the missionary side of Winona will become the world's greatest center for missionaries. The spirit of the conference was beautiful throughout. It has been refreshing to me."

Others spoke of the early morning meetings led by Peter McFarlane and Doctor Massee as the most helpful of the conference. Many referred to the wonderful messages given by Dr. M. E. Dodd, Doctor Shillito of London who preached the opening sermon of the conference, Dr. C. M. Gordon and Dr. Gifford Gordon of Melbourne, Australia, Doctor Chivers and Dr. William Sherwood of London, Dr. George L. Robinson, Chicago, Doctor Robertson, Evangelist Bob Jones, Bishop Spreng and others.

The closing day was one that will remain in the memory of all present. The morning service at 6:45 was led by Doctor Massee, his theme being, "Transforming Love." Bible teaching was held at 8:30 and 9:30 by Mr. H. A. Ironside and Miss Grace Saxe. Doctor Chivers spoke at 10:30 and again at 2:30. A great men's meeting was held at 4 p.m. at the historic Indian mound, with Doctor Biederdorf, director of the Bible conference, in charge. At the same hour Miss Saxe spoke to women in the auditorium. Dr. C. G. Jordan spoke at the first of the two evening meetings on, "The Coming Revival," which he declares is near at hand, and the closing sermon was given by Dr. J. C. Broomfield of Pittsburgh, on, "The Wonderful Christ." This was the high-water mark of the conference and a fitting climax, Christ being lifted up in all his glory and majesty. Dr. J. C. Breckenridge, general secretary of the Winona Assembly and Bible Conference, pronounced the benediction.

The Federated Churches of Cleveland

By JOHN R. SCOTFORD

"CHURCH Union" is a popular slogan of the day. All manner of schemes for bringing the churches closer together are advocated. At one extreme are plans for general ecclesiastical consolidation which are obviously impossible; at the other, are vague plans for the association of churches. In between one finds an occasional adventure in cooperation which is producing results in practical church unity. The "Federated Churches of Cleveland" is an outstanding example of what may be accomplished in bringing the churches of a great city close to each other in spirit and in work.

"To create and maintain an effective union of the churches of Cuyahoga County" is the purpose of this federation as stated in its constitution. "Union" does not imply the wiping out of denominational lines, but rather a unity of the spirit by which each church is quickened and inspired by its sense of relationship to the others.

To a remarkable degree this goal has been attained. A contagious spirit of good-will pervades the life of the churches. In consequence, the individual congregations are prosperous, the ministers contented, and the impact of the churches upon the life of the city increasingly effective.

How has this atmosphere been created? What are the reasons for this unusual success in the difficult field of inter-church activity?

Certain general factors are important. The traditions of Cleveland pre-dispose the city toward progress. The annual raising of a community fund in excess of $4,000,000 draws the city together and produces spiritual result. Isms do not thrive here. The churches are facing practical problems in a progressive spirit. The absence of outstanding pulpits eliminates a prolific source of ministerial jealousy. The city is not dominated by any single denomination. The churches stand on an equality.

In this general atmosphere the federated churches have builded wisely. Their activities are various, but the foundation is laid by the work of the comity committee, composed of the official representatives of the denominations carrying on work in the Cleveland area, which seeks to guide the expansion of the churches to secure the maximum of ecclesiastical efficiency.

It does this in two ways. Through its survey secretary, John Prucha, the comity committee acts as a fact finding agency for all the churches. Upon request the religious and racial complexion of any section of the city will be ascertained. The denominations commonly ask for such surveys before giving up old work or assuming new. General studies have been made and published of the negro situation, the foreign groups and their churches, and of two large sections of the city where the churches were not satisfied with the progress which they were making. Through the comity committee the churches have access to intimate data as to the city and its life.

The committee seeks to supervise the organizing of new churches and the relocation of old ones. New enterprises and changes of location are reported to the committee. If conflict of interest or difference of judgment develop, hearings are held and the problem studied from all angles. Repeatedly the committee has been able to avoid friction by suggesting to churches better locations than they had themselves discovered. Frequently entire days have been given to the study of the problems of a particular church. Decisions are made in the light of all the circumstances. Even wealthy churches moving from the heart of town to the suburbs have bowed before the moral suasion exerted by the comity committee. The major denominations cooperate so far as church extension work is concerned. The only infractions of comity are on the part of small sects having only one or two churches in the city who insist upon locating where they please. Owing to their theological vagaries such churches have little popular appeal and therefore do not seriously disturb the general scheme of things.

Another activity of the comity committee is to encourage the building of one strong institutional church in each particularly difficult section of the city. Especially where the field is largely foreign, the ideal is to have each church feel that it has behind it the strength of the Protestantism of the city.

The denominations have profited from these principles of comity. The foolish expenditure of money has often been avoided. Because of the wisdom used in locating churches Cleveland has little "ecclesiastical junk" in the way of small churches with no reason for being or hope for the future. A surprising percentage of the churches have both a field and a future. The assurance that there would be no intrusion upon their territory has encouraged the churches to make investments in property, often building for the future. Grievances between churches or denominations are practically unknown. Ecclesiastical comity is a game at which every one wins. The secretary of the federated churches, Mr. E. R. Wright, contends that through this comity committee the churches of Cleveland have true organic unity, functioning together on a common plan with a common purpose, without sacrificing their denominational heritage. To some this will seem an over-statement. A commentary on the situation is the absence of union or undenominational churches in the Cleveland area. Where the denominations cooperate and respect one another's rights there is no need for the organization of independent ecclesiastical units.

Through this committee the denominational officials, the lay leaders, and the pastors long in service have been brought together in cooperation. The real service rendered by this committee has pre-disposed the churches toward the other activities of the federated churches.

Much is done by this organization for the intellectual and spiritual stimulation of both pastors and people. Every year the ministers gather for a retreat at a country home overlooking the valley of the Chagrin river. As opportunity offers, dinners and conferences are held during the year when men such as Chas. E. Jefferson, F. W. Norwood, and Harry F. Ward are heard. The Cleveland ministers receive much inspiration at first hand rather than through books.

In every city there are people who like to attend meetings and public dinners. For these the federated churches conduct noon-day theater meetings in Lent with speakers such as S. Parkes Cadman, Sherwood Eddy, and Bernard Clausen. At the annual meeting of the federated churches the speaker is an outstanding leader such as T. Rondra Williams, John Kelman, or Henry Van Dyke. Such gatherings visualize the unity of the churches in the eyes of the public.

As it has grown in prestige and financial resources the federation has taken over the activities of other bodies. An organization of the women's missionary societies of the city has been incorporated as its women's department. Its primary interest is missionary education, although it has also been active in the promotion of peace sentiment and the creation of international mindedness. Through the civic betterment committee the federation serves as an avenue for the expression of church sentiment on moral issues without taking upon itself the onus of a reform organization. Three years ago the Cuyahoga County Sunday-school Association was absorbed, its debts paid and work assumed. Under the name, "The Council of Religious Education" it functions as a department of the federation, conducting training schools and conventions, promoting week-day religious instruction in the suburban cities, and supervising the work of the daily vacation Bible schools. The "Federated Churches" tends to become the one interdenominational agency in the Cleveland area, working in cooperation with many state and national bodies.

The "Federated Churches" was organized fifteen years ago; E. R. Wright was secretary for fourteen years. At present the staff consists of eight people and the budget is more than $30,000 a year. This sum is raised largely by 4000 individual pledges rather than through church contributions. Financially, the federation does not make itself a burden to the churches. Its policy is to build upon the laymen who remain rather than upon the ministers who come and go. The result has been astonishing stability and financial power, due to the devotion of a considerable number of exceedingly able laymen.

The work of the organization might be criticized from a number of angles. The local churches do not feel a great responsibility toward it. The city is touched more at its center than at its circumference. And yet through this organization a pervasive spirit of fellowship, good-will, and unity has been created among the churches of Cleveland. Whether this be church unity or not depends upon our definition of that term—but it is prerequisite to any more intimate form of church cooperation.

American University of Beirut

BY EDITH M. BACON

BEIRUT by its situation at the crossroads of the Near East is a favored spot for a university. The site chosen by Daniel Bliss, our first president, was one of health and great beauty, out from town about a mile and stretching along the promontory just as South Main street overlooks the water, so we span out over the water of the Mediterranean. Across the sheltered port below the campus is the background of the mighty range of Lebanon mountains.

The university is a great international force. The faculty is thoroughly cosmopolitan and the student body of many races. They are representatives of many hostile races and denominations, but they work together with the heartiest of fellowship, because there is a common bond much bigger than the petty differences. On the faculty there are Americans from all over the United States, of different sects; Canadian and British, French, German, and a Russian working in the same department with a Spanish Jew. There's a Dalmatian technician working with an Armenian adjunct professor, a Bulgarian's assistant, and another adjunct professor who belongs to an old feudal family of Maronites. One of the surgeons is a cousin of the Greek Orthodox Patriarch of Antioch, the direct successor of the original patriarch of the Eastern church. The dermatologist is a Druse; the lecturer on public hygiene and the assistant in obstetrics are Sunni Moslems. The adjunct professor of anatomy is affiliated with the Roman Catholics. A Jew from one of the Zionist colonies in Palestine has been working intimately with an interne, the brother-in-law of a Moslem nationalist leader of Damascus. The technician in the X-ray department is the son of a sheik from Trans-jordania. The new superintendent of the university hospital is the son of a Norwegian immigrant of New Zealand.

After living in the university for six and a half years this environment seems perfectly natural and one does not question the religious sect of his associate any more than his nationality. There are plenty of evidences that the university, while not sectarian, is distinctly Christian. "I am come that ye may have life, and have it more abundantly," is the motto and the Golden Rule is recommended for practical use. While there is no attempt to proselytize, we have the satisfaction of knowing that many lives are changed by the Christian influence. All of us are put to the test whether it be in the class room, the campus or in the homes, and the results are charted in their lives for good or bad. This alone makes a tremendous challenge and a great opportunity to share the gospel of Christ. Regular courses in the study of the Bible are required in the A. U. B. curriculum, for it is believed the Bible takes hold of the consciences of men. It does it by bringing conscience in contact with God. It is tested by the life of the student.

There is an attempt to limit our enrollment to 1200; consequently a good many were turned away this year and we opened with seventeen more than the 1200. There are over twenty different racial groups represented in the student body but the nationalities that represent the largest number are Syrian, Palestinian, Mesopotamian, Armenian, Egyptian, Persian and so on. It caused quite a sensation just before the opening of the university to have a convoy of thirty automobiles from Bagdad, bringing 150 students. About 50 per cent of the students are Moslems, Jews, Druses and Bahais. In Mr. Bacon's department he has four assistants and over 250 students. The teaching staff of the university numbers about 150 divided among the preparatory school, college of arts and science, schools of pharmacy, dentistry and medicine, and nurses training school. On the campus are thirty buildings of stone and fine masonry such as the people of this country are skilled in erecting.

Since we came here women have been admitted into the regular departments of the university. Although the possibility of such a thing was a matter of slow development, the final fulfillment was so sudden that we were astonished at the apparent naturalness of it, in a country where women are not granted the freedom and independence that they enjoy in America. However, the men have encouraged the step and shared full privileges in the classroom and on the campus. The only barriers have been their own mental ones.

The first woman to receive a university diploma was a Hebrew who took her course in the pharmacy school and was graduated last June. Women are now enrolled in all the departments except the preparatory. Two of them are Moslems. One has fallen from her husband's good will and because she insisted upon following the pent-up desire of her heart, she has been divorced by him, the er brought her husband along. They Egyptians. She has had greater educational advantages in her girlhood than he and knew English before he came, but he went at once into the preparatory department to learn English and he could enter the commerce department in the university. She is taking a regular Arts course and has distinguished herself in her aptness and earnestness. She has thrown back her head and goes about the campus with the neck neatly folded about her neck, exposing just the face, a rather striking effect in its severity. One day when she was calling upon me she told me how liberally she had gained this liberty: her husband though devoted to her has not the same courage of his convictions, in fact I am not sure that he has the same convictions. She pleaded with him a long time for the permission to remove the veil from her face; he always made excuses. One day she observed a very respected friend of theirs in the streets of Cairo with her face uncovered. She called her husband's attention: "Ah, but this is in her motor, and is not exposed to public gaze as you would be. Impossible." She dropped the matter for a while until he thought the desire was no longer uppermost in her mind. He is an indulgent husband and very devoted to her, and the people of this country are most generous in the gift-making habit especially as a means of keeping favor. One day he said: "Express your greatest wish and I'll grant it to you." She quite surprised him by asking for an automobile. True to his word however, he got a very nice one and they enjoyed their quiet rides together. Finding a favored opportunity she said: "Are you willing now I should remove my veil?" He recognized her earnestness and the final objection being no longer valid, he granted the desire. His freedom was gained with his full approval and they are a happy couple, making wonderful discoveries in their companionship.

For twenty years there has been competition with the medical department at the school for nursing. The profession in its infancy was looked upon as menial and many girls who entered, had a long sea of prejudice and opposition to overcome, but now the course has developed to such an extent as to be recognized to the extent of presenting a certificate from the platform at the university commencement exercises, and the stigma has been removed. The new Bliss Dale Home which was dedicated last June, provides an attractive home for the nurses. The course provided is similar to that given in the hospitals in America. Many of the graduates now hold responsible positions as superintendents of nurses in government and private hospitals in big cities of the Levant.

The social life of the institution is centered in the building known as West Hall. It is a beautiful building equipped for general relaxation. Strange as it may seem, the people of this part of the world have to be taught to play, and sportsmanship is one of the hardest lessons, but the value of it is felt in every department of the university; a good deal of emphasis is therefore placed upon it. The students are a serious minded body, most of whom count the cost of an education, and have little time or inclination for the distinctly social events that our young people at home require. Their warm hearts and inbred courtesy, together with their earnestness, make them most pliable to influence.

"Radio Romance"

By F. B. McALLISTER

THE FIRST tanned, brawny life-guard I saw engendered within me a sense of awe; later I became a life-guard. A year ago I met my favorite radio preacher; he was so deliciously human that I wondered why my bouffant imagination had caused me to gild the pill.

Recently, what remained of the romance I had woven about the aureate "Mike," quivered on the verge of collapse; I had been asked to broadcast my sermons. It happened this way:

The day was Monday. Wanted on the phone! A charming, resonant baritone voice was asking me if I contemplated broadcasting my sermons. He said that he learned that we were having a crowded house and that, no doubt, my sermons would be of interest to a larger constituency such as the radio might give. If one had told me a week previous to this that I would be nominated by a certain station to broadcast my sermons I would have gasped. But here I was, actually being conferred with by a real, honest-to-gracious announcer. And more, he was selling the idea to me: "Our station has been heard many times on the coast and is received consistently . . ."

He bandied his arguments with the skill of an insurance agent. Almost bewildered I ventured, "Does it cost something? If so, what?" When he replied very suavely, "Oh, yes! The customary charge for churches is . . ." my romance received a staggering blow. But then, some one must pay; why had I not thought of it before? He told me very casually that the established price for churches throughout the country was so much for the first hour, and almost half that sum for each succeeding hour. Further, the announcer informed me that there was not the customary competition in our section of the metropolitan area and that we might use the station every Sunday morning. "In crowded areas, where there are many large churches, they clamor for a place, and the station managers must compel them to await their turn in broadcasting their services; but with us it will be different," he was insisting, "for the competition is not so keen."

As he told me of the advertising value of such a broadcast service I ventured that one could do some good also. He grasped that point and dwelt upon it. "Indeed, and the churches who use it find it a paying investment." Then, "Talk it over with your trustees and let me hear from you."

After his charming voice had ceased, I mentally checked up the cost of radiotizing our morning services. Too much! Yes, too much of a burden by long odds for our people. I considered broadcasting once a month, as many do, and thought I would bring it before the trustees. No! A larger church might do it, but not we. The price was stiff.

So that was it! A sort of an entrance had kept some of these business secrets from thousands of us preachers who had also been yearning for the joy of having folk hear our voices over the radio and, incidentally, "advertise the church and accomplish a lot of good."

Some day, if competition in our district has not become too keen, and we have summoned courage to ask the trustees to put up the cash, we are going to broadcast our services. However, until then we shall no longer tremble before the trumpet.

Parents Who Did Not Pray in Vain

By DOUGLAS G. HARING

SOME MONTHS after the earthquake, when the night school of the Tokio tabernacle was being held in the theological seminary for lack of other quarters, an unkempt, troublesome boy attracted the attention of all the teachers. He was insolent and noisy—he made it embarrassing for his teachers, and several times they discussed dropping him from the school.

Suddenly he developed interest in a Bible class held at the home of the writer. The words of Jesus seemed to take hold on him, and slowly but clearly he changed. He began to dress more neatly; his insolence disappeared and in the past year and a half I have seen him develop into one of the most likable, considerate and helpful boys I ever knew in Japan.

One evening he told me this story. His father had been a doctor of considerable reputation, his mother a trained nurse. When the Japanese-Russian war broke loose, the parents turned the little boy over to an aunt in the Hokkaido, and themselves went to the front to serve the sick and wounded.

He never saw his parents again. They fell victim to some epidemic, smallpox or cholera or some other fatal spectre of the Manchurian plains and to this day he does not know their resting place. His boyish heart was filled with revolt. He hated life and all connected with it. Daily he would hide from other people and weep bitter, scalding tears of loneliness. His aunt brought him up to fear and despise Christianity as an alien superstition.

Then after the earthquake he found that he must learn English for the sake of his business, and he swallowed his anti-Christian feelings to attend the tabernacle night school, for he wanted foreign teachers whose pronunciation could be trusted as a model.

Here he heard in the chapel the reading of the New Testament. Something about the words of Jesus seemed vaguely familiar, like a voice speaking to him from a previous existence. Where had he heard those words? Why did his eyes fill with hot tears and his throat gulp involuntarily whenever they were read? What could it mean?

He would study this Bible and see. Anyhow, it could do no harm to investigate. He went to the foreign teacher's Bible class, and there he learned to love Jesus and to long to follow him. But why did he always experience that nameless emotion and why did the tears always flow when those words of the Master were read?

One day he found the answer. It was time for the seasonal housecleaning, and out from the depths of a closet he dug a big box. "What is this?" he asked his aunt. "Some of your father's things that he left when he went to Manchuria," she replied.

Feverishly he opened the box, and searched its contents for some reminder of his father and mother. Old medical instruments, yellow books on various diseases, letters and papers. But what was this big leather volume? A Bible? Surely it was—an English Bible, well worn, marked and underlined through hours of patient study, and in the front his father's name! Here was a book-mark, a strip of ribbon embroidered by hand, with writing which indicated that some long-forgotten lady missionary had given it to his father. There were other Christian books too.

Accusingly he confronted his aunt. "Was my father a Christian?" "Yes, but the family has always tried to hide the shame. I have done my best to bring you up in the old ways." So that was it! One more question: "Was my mother a Christian?" "Yes, she was."

Now he knew. Those burning tears when he heard the words of Jesus—of course his father and mother had read them to him when he was a boy and all through the years they had been hidden in some recess of his memory, beyond recall. But the emotion that swept over him when he heard, "Blessed are the poor in spirit—" was at last understandable. His parents must have prayed for him, that somehow he might follow in this new path which they had trod despite family opposition. Now he too must heed the call. His duty was to his father's memory and his aunt's efforts must go for nothing.

As he finished the tale, he said, "As soon as I have learned enough about Christianity to know clearly what I am doing, I shall follow in my father's footsteps." May God give him strength to follow to the end!

Atlantic Conference of German Baptists

By R. F. WEGNER

THE twenty-eighth session of the Atlantic Conference of German-speaking Baptists met at Brooklyn, N. Y., Aug. 25-29, convening with the First German Baptist church, organized in 1854. This old congregation occupies a new location at the corner of McPhearsen street and Catalpa avenue. All the services are now bi-lingual; while the older people still use their mother tongue, the Saxon, the younger people prefer the Anglo-Saxon. There are thousands of Germans in our country who ought to be won for Christ and the church, as Paul said in 1 Cor., 9:20-22. To the Americans I became an American that I might win them; to the Germans I became a German that I might win some; I am made all things to all men that I might by all means save some.

The German-speaking Baptists of this land number about 32,000. The Atlantic conferences comprise the twenty-nine churches of the Atlantic states with 4380 members. Our church property represents a valuation of $1,189,500. For home missions $140,630 was contributed during the past year; 194 persons were received by baptism, fifty-seven lost by death and seventy-nine excluded and erased.

The conference accepted the faith once delivered to the saints. Unanimity prevailed at all sessions; there was no unkind criticism though some held different angles of vision. All difficulties and problems were victoriously surmounted. The slogan which prevailed in all discussion was, "The gift of vision, the faith to dare, the will to do." God will help us to attempt greater things for him in this time of enlarged opportunities.

A Boy's Camp in Greece

By L. RAY OGDEN

DIRECTOR OF BOYS' SCHOOL, ISLAND OF SYRIA

THE boys I am working with are not the sons of families in comfortable circumstances, sheltered from evil and taught within the home standards of right and wrong. They are the product of world war demoralization. They came into American orphanages suffering from starvation and almost every form of disease. They had been subsisting on their wits, when almost every mouthful of food they had swallowed had first been obtained through some act of cupidity or a more desperate impulse. A large number of them were without any schooling. Many bore a grudge against humanity in general for the cruel hardships they had been obliged to endure. These boys are not promising material, one will say, from which to make upright citizens. But wait a little.

In order to reduce overhead expenses to the lowest possible figure, the Near East Relief orphanages are very large—the one at Corinth numbering about 2000 children, and a similar number being cared for on the Island of Syria, while in the Caucasus the great orphanage at Alexandropol contained at one time more than 20,000 children. All their lives before coming to the orphanages the boys had been deprived of play and all the normal experiences of a child's life. It seemed, therefore, important that they should be taken in smaller groups and so touched and so affected by the lessons from the life of Christ. They were so impressed by his power to resist temptation, and then, too, by his desire to be baptized as a further sign of purity and

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel Building, Chicago.

"Dr. Clarke Colebrook of New York, state secretary of the convention, says, 'I feel sure that everything is going on to great success with THE BAPTIST. It is growing in favor all along the line.' Thank you.

"Rev. Jesse Boswell of Monroeville, Ohio, writes, 'My subscription to THE BAPTIST and Missions expires in July. I would be lost without these two periodicals. The Journal and Messenger came to my father's home when I was a lad. For sixty years it has made its constant visits—the last few years under the name of THE BAPTIST. I would rather do without a daily paper than forego THE BAPTIST and Missions. Enclosed find $3 to renew both.'

"Mrs. Alice U. Kerr, Edmonds, Wash., writes, 'I am the mayor of this city and perhaps the only woman mayor who is a Baptist in the Northern Baptist Convention. I have read THE BAPTIST for years dating back to when it was the Standard, and I need just such reading to keep me in tune with Him. Am glad we have such a paper. We appreciate it. We need more paying and praying Baptists and fewer discussions and bitter remarks.'

"Rev. G. N. Gardner of Cambridge, Md., writes: 'I wear a WCOY emblem on my watch chain. Its meaning is this: in Cumberland, Md., I organized a young men's class with one regular and several visitors. Several names were submitted for the class. None appealed like WCOY, borrowed from THE BAPTIST. It appealed to the men and in a short time we had twenty-seven in the class. They seem to feel the force of the name and by their lives they say, "You may count on us."'

"A friend in Kansas sends in $3 with the request that THE BAPTIST and Missions be sent for one year to his daughter who is going into another state to teach in a college. She may not have the privilege of attending a Baptist church for the next year. But a wise father sends her the denominational periodicals. During September thousands of Baptist young people will leave home for school or places of labor. Prudent parents will not forget the value of the denominational papers. Mail check and address for your child's subscription to THE BAPTIST today.

"The other day the field editor was waiting at a railroad junction. It was a county-seat town with over 5000 population. He made a tour of the town. First he went to the jail and talked with the jailer. There was no Baptist literature there but much of other types. There was a Carnegie library but no Baptist periodical. In the hotel, in the post office and in the railroad station, he found literature racks well stocked with religious periodicals of other types but no Baptist papers. There was a Baptist church with several hundred members there but none of them had any interest in placing our literature where hungry souls would get it. They are wondering why every year some of their members leave them and join other denominations. Maybe there is a reason.

"The office boy says that in his opinion the 'roundelay' used at the summer assemblies ought to be used as a hymn in morning worship services during the month of September. It runneth thusly: 'If you meet a Baptist loafing in the way, poke him in the ribs and gently to him say: "Come on, Come on," we have a job for you.' The job he has in mind is that of securing prompt renewals of all present subscriptions to THE BAPTIST and a vigorous poking in the slats of all non-subscribing and non-reading members. This musical exhortation and exercise created immense agitation at the assemblies where it was sung. Try it out in your next Sunday morning service. The results will be interesting.

"WCOY now signs off. Vacation days are over. Let's go to work."

submission to the will of his Father, and of making the right start in his life work, that the boys would not be content with doing less themselves.

Finding how moved they were, I urged that when they went to swim that day they should make that act one of purification of mind and body, with earnest prayer that their new purposes might be strengthened. I never believed until I learned of the response on the part of the first group that it would be taken so seriously and become so lasting in effect. Silently, from the camp talk every boy went to the water, prepared himself, then they sang together one of their church baptismal hymns and went in where every lad washed himself, every bit of his body thoroughly, and then dozens of them asked their friends to baptize them. I find since that it was spontaneous with them, for they never talked of it outside. Some adults might call this sacrilegious or profaning a sacred rite, but they would not if they could but have felt that spirit and seen the results. It would be a hard heart indeed that would not melt when, on the last night of each camp, those boys, by scores and hundreds, make their confessions, and express their new determinations and their gratitude. The priest of the ancient Eastern church who gives communion to our hundreds once told me that he had never found such silent and genuine devotion as among these boys, and gave all the credit to the spirit of our work, as do the orphanage teachers and leaders.

I have never in America seen boys take so wholeheartedly and unreservedly all of the teachings and ideals of a Y. M. C. A. camp and then follow them so consistently after leaving the camp. Never in any American camp have I seen boys given an opportunity to express themselves more naturally and spontaneously than could be done in the daily routine of the large orphanages.

So it was decided to establish a summer camp to which the boys might come in units of 100 and remain for two weeks. This would give an opportunity for closer association with the boys for my personal conferences, and for the use of some searching method of uncovering and correcting old faults.

The camp was managed with the utmost simplicity. No superfluities were allowed in the supplies. There was no communication with the outside world. A most simple life of preparing and eating food and policing quarters, of sports and sleep and walks and talks was lived.

The talks were the prime factor in the experiment. When we received, nearly 3000 years ago, from one who knew these very countries during His own boyhood, the admonition, "Know thyself," it was undoubtedly meant that unless we did know ourselves no progress toward the advancement of either individual or state could be made.

In the talks we first teach these boys to know themselves. We do not mince matters when we show them the state from which they are emerging, at the same time pointing out to them that they alone are responsible if that state should continue.

Many of these warped little minds have to be freed from a "grudge." Some have to be untangled from a web of thought that has led them to feel that the world owes them something, and consequently that they owe the world little. Many have bent under the weight of the very word "orphan" and feel that they cannot surmount the stigma that attaches to it. I have been asked more than once, "What chance has an orphan?"

All of this mass of surging thought has to be stirred in the talks, and stirred vigorously sometimes to bring things to light. The light thrown upon the "thing" that raises its head out of the brew is often a cruel light. Still, in all the work with the boys here, this process of bringing to the surface has to be gone through. Once things are brought out and well-aid, practical, constructive measures can be applied.

On Saturday nights the boys take turns by units (there are 100 boys in a unit) in giving a little entertainment, and every time I am amazed at the way they develop in music and the little skits they get up. Their group games and their stunts are interesting. Mr. Wilcox, the educational director, says that here one finds the project method in education in ual practice. We do not entertain m, but they take turns in entertaining rest of the boys and us in whole-ne and simple ways.

Every Sunday night our boys gather together for their evening meeting. We ownups marvel at the way in which the boys themselves do it all. Last Sunday's program is an example. The boys sang both Greek and Armenian chants, in "Faith of Our Fathers" in perfect English. There were a few musical members, then a fifteen minute talk by one of the leaders, a boy of sixteen. He read his Bible verse and then gave his message without the least hesitation or embarrassment. The meeting closed with the unit singing in beautiful harmony
"Bide With Me" in alto and soprano.
These boys are from seven to ten years of age, taught entirely by their seventeen-year-old leader, who is now also teaching in the orphanage school. Each Sunday night different units have their turn. Of course we, their elders, help in planning and preparation, but it is the boys who do the work. It has brought tears to the eyes of visitors who have gone into the orphanage dormitories where 100 small boys were saying their prayers for the night, singing, repeating prayer, and then tucking themselves away without a whisper. That, too, was due to their own idea of the way it should be done after their camp experience. They were never told that they could do this, except perhaps by their own boy leaders.

Secretary Hoover is quoted in the United States Daily saying in a long official message concerning the development of super-power: "The federal government, the states or particular local districts should assume the burden and ownership of the public works where the major purpose of the development is navigation, irrigation, reclamation or flood control." Where electric power is involved, it was his opinion that "the federal government should not go into the business of either generating or distributing." Then, in his opinion, the states and local districts may properly go into such business. If so, why not the federal government also? This specific exception excites curiosity.

"Speed-itis" is the subject for an interesting editorial in one of our Baptist exchanges. The editorial deals with the swift pace of American life and is a noble plea for a simpler, saner life in which people will have time to dream and to think. But why "Speed-itis"? The "itis" words refer to inflammatory diseases of organs, as bronchitis, colitis, peritonitis, conjunctivitis. Infirmities of tendency, state or action are expressed by "ismus," as strabismus. If one must resort to barbarisms why run to extremes? Why not say speedismus? "Speeditis"!

Baptist papers are falling into line in opposition to the compulsory reading of the Bible in the public schools. The Biblical Recorder summarizes the case thus: "Such a law would be in plain violation of the Baptist principle of the separation of church and state. It must inevitably be sectarian. It forces some people to support a religion they do not believe in, and to put their children under the influences of a faith they reject. Our Baptist people, in other lands and ages, have often suffered from such 'disabilities,' and they have protested. In America, when we were feeble, we led the great fight for the separation of church and state. Now that we are strong, let us not go back on that one principle of ours which practically all denominations in America have come to accept."

this office as a man of peace and soon plexed and disturbed nation at war. First we were to fight with dollars and not with men and soon were raising four million men. We were not fighting people. We were fighting a military ocracy. We were fighting for humanity, for democracy, for freedom, for the federal powers, for a remade world, for self-determination, against militarism, for freedom of the seas, for liberty everywhere. We look back even now, probably over more than now, as in a haze.

Sometimes it seems that the phrases which thundered out of Washington to make people everywhere free are falling about our heads like bricks. We are everywhere supposed to be renegades, and the only renegades in the world, to the principles which had a strong hold on the purposes of men until we deserted the cause."

"Get Out the Vote" is to be the slogan of the American Legion this fall. Its purpose is to increase the number of people who actually go to the polls. How to vote after they arrive at the polling place is no concern of the legion. The slogan is good. Everybody ought to take part. But getting out the vote is only a gesture toward good government, and may be a futile one. The vital problem is how to assemble intelligence and conscience at the polls in support of

tarism in education and signed by college presidents, clergymen, lawyers and others. The report charges that the purpose of the war department "apparently is to go on, putting military training into one school after another, until all boys over fourteen years of age enrolled in educational institutions are being drilled to take part in war." The report is signed by Pres. William Allan Neilson of Smith college; Dean Roscoe Pound of the Harvard law school; Bishop William F. Anderson of the Methodist Episcopal church; Pres. Mary E. Woolley of Mount Holyoke college; Judge George W. Anderson of the United States circuit court of appeals; Prof. Francis B. Sayre of the Harvard law school; Dean David L. Edsall of the Harvard school of medicine; James P. Munroe, manufacturer, author and life member of the corporation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and Rabbi Harry Levi and seventeen other prominent citizens.

An interesting comment upon the statement that the post office department is a great political machine is afforded by a circular letter of Postmaster General New calling attention to the law on the subject and quoting the following executive order as applied to persons in the classified civil service: "No person in the executive civil service shall use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the results thereof. Persons who by the provisions of these rules are in the competitive classified service, while retaining the right to vote as they please and to express privately their opinions on all political subjects, shall take no active part in political management or in political campaigns." But a wink is due. The order does not apply to presidential appointees.

Cardinal Dubois of Paris is quoted concerning the eucharistic congress lately held in Chicago as follows: "The congress could not have been the success it was except for the liberty given to the organizers of it. What an example we found there of a truly liberal spirit, favorable to all happy initiatives provided they be for the good of the country. The civil authorities collaborated in perfect understanding with the religious authorities in order to prepare the congress and insure its complete success. No dissensions, no obstacles. On the contrary, the official neutrality never ceased to be benevolent. The president of the republic sent a message to the congress. The municipal governments of New York and Chicago received the papal legate and the other cardinals in the public halls of their respective cities. The streets of Chicago were decorated, the American flag mingling with the papal colors. The police assured the free passage of the procession and watched over the order of the ceremonies. Everywhere were marks of consideration, foresight, politeness and even sympathy. And this was a Catholic celebration in a country where the Catholics are far from the majority." It is to be hoped that the cardinal will use his influence to secure such treatment of religious minorities in Catholic countries.

OBEEDIENCE TO LAW (TEMPERANCE LESSON)

Lesson Text: Lev. 26:3-20. Golden Text: Lev. 10:9

The two sides from which temperance must be approached are the legal side and the personal side. On the personal side we appeal to boys and girls, men and women, to let strong drink alone as a beverage because of its evil effect upon health, industry and character. Upon the legal side we make the appeal on the basis of patriotism, citizenship and public welfare.

Motives

How make operative law enforcement especially with reference to the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead act? Put the fear of the law into the hearts and minds of the people inclined to break the law and that will materially decrease crime. Hanging the murderer summarily will have a salutary effect upon that capital crime. Doubtless there is truth in that contention and yet punishment has limitations. The man who obeys the law only for fear of the punishment that disobedience will bring is a criminal at heart. The lesson is based upon that idea; but in spite of the awful threats contained in the lesson text, the Israelites kept on violating the laws of God. The threat of punishment did not seem to make the people law-abiding. Nor did the promise of prosperity as a consequence of obedience work any better. Law is all right; but alone, it is powerless to make men either good or bad. We need again to study Paul's philosophy, expressed in the words, "What the law could not do." The motive that makes all just laws operative is love. Love worketh no ill to a neighbor. "Love is the energy of a steadfast yoke bent upon creating fellowship." That definition is adequate for love of country as well as for love of God and fellow men. Therefore the great need of the United States today, so far as the enforcement of law is concerned, is a general spiritual revival of religion which will result in changing men from a basis of law to a basis of love and from selfish license to spiritual liberty.

Method

The method must fit the ends which we have in view. If the end we have in view is spiritual, then the method must harmonize with the end. Stanley Jones found that the preaching of moral law in India got him nowhere; his spiritual ministry as a missionary Christ. When he began living like Jesus and telling the people about Jesus and his way of life, the change was almost magical. Let the state, backed strongly by public sentiment and supported by the churches, continue to force the laws against all forms of law-breaking; but let the churches return to their specific ministry of changing hearts of men. "We shall never have an honest horse race until we have an honest human race." The business of churches is to create an honest human race by the power of the gospel.

For sixty-six years she gave of her best to the uplift and evangelization of the people of India. This small biography will long continue to be an interesting piece of missionary literature and Christian achievement.

Five Minutes Daily with Luther, by John T. Mueller. New York: Macmillan. $2.50.

The heart of Luther's teachings is here arranged in daily devotional readings culled from his commentaries on Galatians, First and Second Peter, Jude, the Seventeenth chapter of John's Gospel, expositions of various psalms, and other passages in which the message of salvation is characteristically emphasized. This book is also an excellent reference work on Luther's chief teachings. For his purpose an index of subjects and an index of scriptural passages treated have been added. The book exhibits the rugged strength of Luther's language and his penetrating power of exposition.

—F. H. FAHRINGER.

Our Parish in India, by Isabel Brown Rose. New York: Revell. $1.50.

This is a moving-picture, a film in print, portraying graphically the strange scenes of every-day life in a far-away district of India. It is a racy recital of incidents, pathetic, unusual, funny, evidently drawn from actuality, and giving the reader glimpses of the situations and conditions amid which missionaries carry on their work. Unlike "The Christ of the Indian Road," this book deals chiefly with the surface of things. Whereas E. Stanley Jones discloses the philosophical and theological problems of the educated Indian and shows how Christ meets his need, this writer reveals the tragic experiences of the outcast and the new life brought to him by the message and ministry of the Christian worker. The urgent need of more generous support of medical, educational, and social-betterment agencies in general is seen. The writer believes we should all desire first of all to do some kindly deed to relieve great suffering or actual starvation before attempting to put our evangel of love in words. These chapters will doubtless quicken the interest of many in missionary work by enabling readers to see clearly the difficulties our representatives meet and to share the joy of the triumphs they witness.

Poems, by Henry Crocker. Published by the National Survey Co.

From time to time through the years there have appeared in THE BAPTIST delightful poems contributed by Henry Crocker. As a memento of his eightieth birthday anniversary these poems have been collected in volume form—and a fat volume they make, covering over 200 pages. Henry Crocker is a delightful poet. Listen to this, the initial poem of the volume:

Chick-a-dee-dee

A long time ago, in a clump of small trees,
Was a little bird college conferring degrees,
And on one little fellow, so learned was he,
And so pious withal, they bestowed a D. D.

The name of the birdie thus honored was Chick;
His body was small, his motions were quick;
I never have learned what the reason could be,
But his brother birds smiled, and I said,
"Chick, a D. D.?"

But Chick did not know they were smiling, and he Was as happy a bird as there was in the tree;

And oft to himself, not to others, in glee
He chuckled and said, "I am Chick, a D. D."

What! Chick, a D. D.? Little Chick, a D. D.?
Oh, yes, and a very good preacher is he;
And many a sermon delightful to me
Have I heard in the church of the Chick-a-dee-dee.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Nearly forty-seven million persons are now members of churches in the United States. The gain in membership during 1925 was 800,000, the largest in several years.

It is reported that the International Council of Religious Education will undertake to promote ten city-wide cooperative training schools for teachers this season. The Chicago school will try to achieve as a goal the training of 75 per cent of the teachers employed in the churches within the next five years.

Jiddu Krishnamurti came and spoke. A sample of his gospel follows: "We cannot always physically escape from the turmoil about us, but when we learn the way there are doors and windows opened through which we can pass into bliss. If terrible experiences have come to you, forget those experiences and remember the lessons they brought. The lessons are the necessary things, not the experiences." Jiddu has retired to meditate. Jesus is still busy saving the world.

Pres. W. H. P. Faunce of Brown university closes a beautiful personal tribute to Dr. Charles W. Eliot with these words: "We do not honor any man by claiming he was perfect. Doctor Eliot was great in his limitations, as in his powers. His striking individualism did not always allow for the beauty and power of cooperative action. His religious faith like his scientific theory, was cool and analytic, with no room for passionate abandon. Not his the mystic ardors of the mediaeval saints. Not his the boundless surrender of the Hallelujah Chorus, of which Handel in writing it said: 'I did see all heaven opened before me.' But within the limits which he himself had set, he was one of the finest characters and most compelling personalities America has seen."

"The Methodists, the Baptists and other free churches enjoy more religious liberty in Soviet Russia than they did in Catholic Austria twenty years ago or in Lutheran Saxony fifty years ago," declares Bishop John Nuelson. "I noticed a shop in the main business street of Moscow which is typical of the situation. In one show window there were exhibited communistic banners, mottoes, and other paraphernalia used in the meetings of the Young Communists, and in the other window were exhibited crucifixes, candles, ikons, vessels, sacerdotal gowns and all other accessories of church services. Stepping into the store I found that over the counter on one side were sold the means of atheistic propaganda, and over the opposite counter the religious objects. On the Newsky Prospect in Leningrad I also found a store where ikons, crucifixes and all other sacred objects were on sale."

Judge J. F. McIntyre expresses the opinion in Good Housekeeping "that if parents would tell their young people that the prohibition law, being a law, must be obeyed; and if they would deny to their boys and girls the taste of liquor, the appetite would pass away in this generation."

Among efforts to unite Christendom, the Society of Free Catholics, which is in no sense a Roman Catholic body, defines its essential aim in the statement: "We seek a reconciliation of the individual and congregational liberties developed in the free churches with the essential order and government of the Catholic system." The society, after seven years of effort finds itself misunderstood and opposed and with slight prospect of winning general acceptance among the Christian people of England.

The diversified and growing technique of the Inquiry, has added the feature of "reconciliation trips," which appear to be a modern and greatly improved adaptation of the slumming party. Such a trip was made last February to negro Harlem by a party of about a hundred persons from different educational institutions. As a result the party announced five "learnings," namely: "that the negroes are capable of taking care of themselves; they are independent and they know it; they are quiet and thoughtful; they take to education naturally; their standards of living are good." The "learnings" of a negro "reconciliation trip" through a representative white community would be interesting.

A study of ninety-six churches by Prof. Arthur E. Holt for the Chicago Federation of Churches shows that of the membership of these churches 9 per cent are professional people, nearly 7 per cent business men (employers, owners, managers or executives), and 67 per cent wage earners.

What a man who affects acquaintance with science can sometimes know is amazing. For instance, the Word and Way quotes a writer in another paper saying: "Science forbids us longer to indulge our minds with such concepts as the virgin birth, vicarious suffering, the threefold God, or salvation and the life everlasting." It must be a thrilling experience to have "Science" confide to one such esoteric wisdom.

Dec. 5 has been designated by the American Bible Society as Universal Bible Sunday. However, another Sunday near this date may be set aside by the pastor for this urgent purpose. The topic this year, as announced by the society, will be the "Voice and the Word" or the spoken and the printed Word. Special free literature, which includes a brochure written by Mr. Willard Phipps, has been prepared by the society for use on this occasion.

Education week is projected by the National Education Association and other cooperating organizations for November 7-13. Sunday is "God and Country Day" for the consideration of education in the home, the school and the church. Monday, as "Constitutional Rights Day," will emphasize the principles that "every personal right implies a reciprocal obligation to respect the same right for others; liberty which does not consider the public welfare is license; a demand for personal liberty which is not prefaced by a pledge of service to the cause of liberty is selfish and unreasonable." Tuesday will be "Patriotism Day," conceiving patriotism as "a fulfillment of individual obligations to the community, state, a nation in peace or in war; a wholesome respect for the symbols of the commonwealth; and a will to defend the principles of liberty, equality, justice, and a tolerance which actuated our forefathers to found it." Wednesday is "Equal Opportunity Day," devoted to adequate education, to the elimination of illiteracy and to Americanization; Thursday, "Armed Day," for "peace with honor and security;" Friday, "Know Your School Day." Saturday is "Community Day" devoted to "adequate parks and playgrounds for every community; increased availability of good books through public libraries; cultivation of common interests in sports, music, art, and other wholesome fields for the improvement of civic unity; and every schoolhouse a community center."

Professor Herrick of the University of Chicago has written a new book. In one of its chapters the first sentence says, "Rats are not men." Between these two species of animals there are, indeed, observable differences. But when one comes to assess those differences, the sentence acquires a degree of ambiguity. Is it intended as an encomium upon rats?

In addition to carrying on his regular work at the military garrison at Fort Snelling, Minn., Chaplain Frank C. Rideout has occupied a number of the leading pulpits of the twin cities during the summer months. Among the number have been the Hennepin Avenue Methodist, Minneapolis, the First Baptist and the First Swedish Baptist of St. Paul, and the Como Congregational of the Midway. This is made possible on account of the fact that during the summer months outdoor field services are conducted at the army garrison at 9 a.m. Other speaking engagements by Chaplain Rideout have included an address at the municipal celebration of Independence day in St. Paul, an address at the state gathering of the American Legion and an address before the Professional Men's Club of Minneapolis. During the past year Chaplain Rideout has been instrumental in raising a fund of more than $60,000 for a new chapel to be erected soon at this picturesque and historic garrison of the Northwest. The money has been obtained through patriotic organizations, individual subscriptions and churches. When completed the chapel will undoubtedly be the finest place of worship in the entire army.

In the confusion of a holiday week in which Labor day was an idle day and the preceding and following day doubly busy, one of the paragraphs of Folks, Facts and Opinion separated itself in some fashion so as to become two, which appeared on pages 918 and 919 of the issue of September 11. Herewith is the paragraph as it was originally written: The story of the virgin birth of Christ is likely to stay in the Bible as long as there is any Bible. Its greatest weakness is in the way some of its friends argue for it. Miracle or myth seems to be the true alternative. If the story is true, there is a clear case of the intervention of supernatural power. But Rev. Solomon Henshaw submits in the Christian World this incher in the way of evidence which he thinks ought to silence all evolutionists: There is in the biological world a process known as parthenogeny, that is, the production of an individual without fertilization. Examples of such are the bees (males) of honey-bees, which are developed from unfertilized eggs. Aphids multiply by this process and are prolific, virgin females producing millions of progeny. Unmated mothers among silkworms, silk worms, ants, etc., produce male and female offspring. With such prodigious creations in natural history, that may not be a later development in biology prove among higher animals? That is, the virgin birth is a unique, supernatural and saving miracle because nature is full of similar phenomena!

Is Minnesota pointing to a recovery of the home? In that state the number of marriages was 450 greater in 1925 than in 1924, and the number of divorces 130 less.

For six years Sacco and Vanzetti have been under accusation in Massachusetts for murder and within sight of the electric chair. The case has disturbed even international relations. Lately another has confessed the crime charged to them and their attorney states that for six years the government has possessed and concealed evidence tending to establish their innocence. Critics of the government have their eye upon this case with interest.

Some Methodists are perplexed. Trinity college at Durham, N. C., was a Methodist school. Mr. James B. Duke, tobacco and cigaret magnate, gave the institution, as the story goes, $40,000,000, and its name was changed, not without misgivings, to Duke university. Since his death, appraisers are reported to have found among his holdings fine wines, brandies and whiskey of an estimated value of $12,000. The university is said to be included among the legatees.

The greatest feature of the greatest week in the history of Shanghai college, East China, according to Pres. F. J. White, occurred when the alumni, at their largest gathering, on the last day of the commencement exercises in June, pledged their loyalty and expressed their determination to stand by their alma mater. The alumni are raising funds to build the tower of a new chapel which is to be erected. The graduating class gave as a farewell gift over $1000 for the purchase of Chinese books.

What did the Knights of Columbus request of President Coolidge? In the report of the conference between the president and Supreme Knight James A. Flaherty, the latter is said to asked the "good offices" of the United States in seeking a solution of the Mexican problem, and nothing more—especially no intervention or political pressure of any kind. But the Commonweal, liberal Catholic paper, says he "merely pointed out that conditions in the neighboring republic are such that its official administration should not have been accorded recognition." But is the raising of the question of recognition a good way to initiate "good offices?"

NEW BAPTIST HYMNAL

Compiled by a Committee of Northern and Southern Baptists

The New Baptist Hymnal is all that skill can make it. The plates are entirely new. All words are between the staves. New tunes for old hymns have been largely discarded, because they have not seemed popular.

The Hymnal is divided into five sections:

1. The selected standard church hymns, classified by subjects, the selection being made upon the basis of practical use after careful investigation.
2. A separate section containing nearly one hundred of the choicest modern gospel songs.
3. A division of children's hymns and songs. Other hymns contained in the Hymnal suitable for use in children's services are also listed in this section.
4. Special attention has been given to Glorias and Responses, which are now so commonly used in church services.
5. A new arrangement of Responsive Readings—so arranged that they occupy one column and in a few cases a single page but in no case will it be necessary to turn the page in using the readings.

The New Baptist Hymnal contains more than 400 hymns and songs, and is a volume of over 500 pages, strongly bound in green cloth. Price, $1.00 net.

Farm prices in July reached the lowest level in nearly two years, the department of agriculture announced in its monthly price index. The purchasing power of grains, fruits, vegetables, cotton and cotton seed also dropped.

Dr. F. W. Meyer reports from Cadiz, Philippine Islands: "The hospital trade is booming. We certainly have no lack of patients. Last year we admitted 541 in-patients and this year we shall come close to the 800 mark. At this time we have admitted 150 more patients than in the corresponding period of the past year."

Shilluk Christians in the Sudan have their own way of naming their Sunday-school classes. They have among others the following classes: men who are considered honorable (i.e. grey-haired men); those who are younger; those just married; the boys who dance; the boys who have just begun to dance; the boys who herd the cattle; the little boys who herd the sheep.

This is good enough to be passed along. The editor of the Baptist and Reflector tells of seeing a car in front of his on a Tennessee road wantonly driven so as to crowd two walking negro girls almost off the road. Let him tell the rest himself. "Our blood boiled and had it been possible, we should have told the fellow a few things about common decency to say nothing about the American idea of a square deal. We are grateful that the class represented by this fellow is dying off or being converted to the Christian spirit of the golden rule. And somehow, there was a little relief when we approached the car and saw that its license plate bore the name, Oregon."

Fellowship, inspiration, and instruction are combined in a special woman's workers' conference, to be held in Erie, Pa., Oct. 18, in connection with the state convention. There will be reports by state secretaries and conferences regarding the various activities of the societies. A conference on, "Reasonable Service for Baptist Women" will be conducted by Miss Ina E. Burton, national promotional secretary. Dr. Wm. G. Russell, state director of the Board of Missionary Cooperation will speak on, "Suggested Cooperation." The annual state meeting will be held Oct. 20. Mrs. Clayton D. Eulette of Chicago will speak representing the Board of Missionary Cooperation. Miss Lillian H. Eastman of the Kemendine girls' school of Rangoon, Burma, will tell of her work. Miss Mildred Kaminski will speak on the Christian Americanization work being done in the Atlantic district. Baptist work in China will be portrayed by Dr. Charles Bromley, our missionary, home on furlough. The new study books for the year will be discussed, Mrs. Joseph S. Wilds presenting the foreign book, "Moslem Women," and Mrs. Frank Newcomb the home book, "Our Temple Hills." Features of the W. W. G. work will be a banquet in the gymnasium of First church at 6 p.m. and a pageant in the church auditorium as the culmination of the evening service.

Nearly eight billion cigarettes—the exact figure was 7,961,709,918—were produced in the United States in July according to figures made public Aug. 28 by the bureau of internal revenue which based its calculation on the sales of revenue stamps for cigarettes. The production in July, 1925, on the same basis of calculation, was 7,613,553,044.

Why Should I Pray?

By A. H. PAGE

WHY should I pray?
*Tiny atom in immensity,
Puny midget in infinity,
Shall not God's mighty will be done
Uninfluenced by you or me?*

Why should I pray?
*Part of the boundless, limitless whole,
With the power of the will to control,
Things are accomplished by praying
In league with the Infinite Soul.*

Why should I pray?
*Prayer is the voice of supreme desire,
Prayer is the will of a man on fire,
A will united with God's good will
Can lift humanity higher.*

For the first time in history, Christianity finds itself actually facing the world on a scale adequate for a test of its power and finality, in the opinion of the Western Christian Advocate. It specifies that the world which now confronts the church is the whole world and not merely a section of it, a highly developed technical world, a highly developed social world and a highly democratized world.

Mr. Charles P. Tshia, principal of Kaying academy, South China, wrote in June: "In spite of so much opposition, our student body increased 18 per cent. During the fall term five of our students gave their lives to Christ and took him as their Saviour and Master. This spring, of the seven received four were from the boys' school. People who dare to follow Christ as their Saviour and Master and to recognize God as the Almighty One at a time like this must have great physical and moral courage as well as strong Christian faith."

A Hymn

By H. F. HUSE

HAVE faith in God, nor let delay
*Too much thy soul distress;
God has his plan, he has his day,
He waits—the more to bless.*

God loves thee, has thee in his heart;
*He hears thy earnest plea;
In his own time he will impart
The gift that's best for thee.*

If one door close, his will revealed—
*Another, thy reward,
Will bring thee to a richer field
In which to serve thy Lord.*

Then lift thy voice in joyful song,
*Nor let thy heart be sad;
God leads thee all the way along,
In him rejoice, be glad.*

The Baptist school at Toungoo, Burma, has a present enrolment of 474. Last year at the same time there were 415 students. Of the forty Burmese boys in the high department Rev. E. N. Harris writes in the News, the Baptist paper published in Rangoon, "For the most part they are well behaved and except on Buddhist holidays they are as faithful in attendance on Bible study as any."

George B. Huntington, treasurer of the Foreign Mission Society, accompanied by Mrs. Huntington, sailed from New York, Aug. 14, on a visit to the mission fields of the society. For several years the board of managers, and especially the finance committee, have desired that the treasurer should make such a visit for the purpose of studying methods of financial administration and securing information that will be of value to the board in this department of the work. Mr. Huntington's itinerary is as follows: Burma, Oct. 11-Nov. 11; Assam and Bengal-Orissa, Nov. 13-Dec. 10; South India, Dec. 11-Jan. 4; Philippine Islands, Jan. 23-Feb. 2; South and East China, Feb. 5-Mar. 1; Japan, Mar. 3-Mar. 20. During his absence the assistant treasurer, Forrest Smith, will be in charge of the treasury department. Most of Mr. Huntington's time on each field will necessarily be given to conferences with mission treasurers and with reference committees and property committees. He hopes, however, to be able to see something of the actual missionary work in at least a few of the stations on each field.

Rev. and Mrs. Albert Ehr Gott, touring the world, have been in Hongkong, Swatow, Canton, Shanghai, Hangchow, Shaohsing, Soochow, Macao, Tientsin and Peking, China. They find everywhere "unrest and collective indignation over foreign violations of Chinese rights. There is emphatic insistence upon the abrogation of the treaties in their present form." In Peking "all the legations are well fortified and give the appearance of medieval fortresses. But should any Chinese army with its modern equipment rise against them all foreigners would be hopelessly lost. But there is no likelihood of such a disaster happening." Doctor Ehr Gott thinks that this universal unrest is a "great compliment to the missionary endeavors of the past 100 years." He recalls that twenty-five years ago the venerable Dr. William Ashmore prophesied just such an awakening. He sat in with our missionaries in annual conference at Swatow and with those of the Southern Convention in Shanghai, and was deeply impressed with the brave, wise and self-effacing spirit in which they were meeting this delicate crisis. "We met intimately Chinese Christians enough to hearten us for the stability of Christianity in China in face of the most alarming reports to the contrary," he says. Similar upheavals were in evidence in India, Assam and Burma. Everywhere they found missionaries handling the situation in a statesmanlike manner, and regard the missionaries worthy of our unqualified confidence and support.

Referendum Rather Than a Row

ONE FREQUENTLY hears the remark that while the Baptist denomination boasts of its superior democracy, it is almost the only Protestant denomination that has no provision for a referendum. Some months ago THE BAPTIST made somewhat casually a suggestion of the advisability of a referendum on questions that seem at once important to the denomination and provocative of controversy. Since that time the suggestion has received favorable notice in the Watchman-Examiner and certain other papers. Perhaps a little further editorial comment on the subject may be timely.

The principle of the referendum is inherent and infeasible in the fellowship of the Baptist denomination. No by-law or resolution of any sort from any source is necessary to confer the power of the referendum, and no additional machinery is required in order to carry the principle into effect. Every church in the whole Baptist denomination has the unlimited right to consider and vote upon any subject which it may regard as proper for its own consideration. This right extends to every subject considered or action taken by any association, state convention, general convention and the Baptist World Alliance. No church is under any obligation, expressed or implied, to wait until some question is referred to it from any of these cooperative bodies. Its power to act is original. In fact, not only has every church the full right of referendum, but it has equally the full right of the initiative. It can propose to the denominational bodies with which it cooperates any course of action on any subject that seems to it proper at any time. And churches exercise that power at will. Almost every meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention is followed by reports of churches here or there that take formal action of approval or disapproval concerning some action of the convention.

It is legitimate, of course, for any cooperative organization to refer to the churches for advice any subject which it may have under consideration. Such reference, if made, has the force merely of a fraternal request, and in response to it any church may act or not as the church itself may see fit to do.

The effect of a referendum in the Baptist denomination is purely advisory. It cannot by any possibility be mandatory, for no church or any cooperative organization can exercise any mandatory power within the denomination except in its own meetings and upon its own members and administrative agencies. If 99 per cent of all of the churches within the field of the Northern Baptist Convention should vote in favor of some particular proposal, their vote would have effect as a rule only in those churches. It would have no such effect in the other 1 per cent of the churches. Even among the churches voting favorably it would have the effect merely of an expressed common agreement from which any such church would be at liberty to withdraw. This is one of the peculiarities of our fluid policy, which often puzzles people accustomed to some sort of mandatory denominational control. It is simply a phase of the fellowship of comity, rather than of organized control, which is a creative principle in the denomination.

Of what value, then, can be the right of the initiative and referendum without mandatory power? Its value lies in the possibility of assessing the state of mind of the churches for advisory purposes. Suppose for instance, that instead of an annual parliamentary wrangle, or sustained volleys of hot-shot echoing in articles and editorials appearing in some of our periodicals, we should calmly try to find out what our people are really thinking about the issues raised in denominational controversy. The result of such an effort would doubtless be the accumulation of some valuable information useful to our societies in determining their policies.

Method has a good deal to do with the value of such a referendum. Ordinarily the denominational procedure is about as follows: Somebody proposes in a convention something against which somebody else finds objection. Talk begins, and oscillates back and forth, generating more heat than light. Feelings become irritated. Groups form behind militant leaders. The contagion of conflict spreads. Resolutions are introduced having strife in every line. These are debated with parliamentary acrimony in the presence of applauding or heckling partisans. The resolutions come to a breathless vote. There is a majority on one side or the other. It is a glorious victory to one faction and a burning shame to the other. Thence, "carry the fight to the churches" and repeat the procedure locally wherever possible. The net tangible result is unhappy division with a variety of deplorable consequences.

There is a better way. When a divisive question of serious importance challenges the attention of the denomination, make it the subject of fraternal conferences in which the various phases of the subject are considered with a view to getting all of the light possible and to finding ground for agreement. Use the technique of inquiry rather than of debate. Seek understanding rather than a vote. If in the use of this method it seems advisable to ask the mind of the local churches for the guidance of a convention, the thing may be done decently and in good order, with the hope of achieving harmony and closer co-operation.

West Virginia Speaks

READERS of THE BAPTIST will thank us for borrowing the following fine editorial from the Baptist Banner of West Virginia, which saves us the trouble of trying to say what could hardly be better said by anybody. Referring to current denominational controversy, Editor G. E. Bartlett says:

"The writer of this editorial has many times been approached by his friends who want to know why he does not take part in this heated discussion. We answer by saying that we do not believe that it gets us anywhere except to a poisoned heart. So far as our attitude is concerned relative to our Christian faith, we are glad to bear testimony that we are trusting in the merits of Jesus Christ as Saviour whom we believe to be God's only begotten Son, who is our advocate with the Father, who was born of a virgin, upon whom God laid the iniquity of us all, who came to reveal the Father's love and set forth a Christian commission, who after a life of holy living voluntarily accepted Calvary to redeem men from sin, who on the third day rose again, and who today is our intercessor at the right hand of God. In such a Saviour as this we trust and live.

"We believe that the ordinances of the Christian church are two—baptism (which is immersion and should be administered to believers only) and the Lord's Supper. These tenets of our faith, however, we have received by prayerful study of the New Testament, and not by any resolution adopted by any one group of people in convention assembled. No resolution adopted by the Northern Baptist Convention has any power to change the life of a local church or an individual.

"This faith above expressed we hold with unflinching courage, but we are unwilling to participate in a discussion that can avail only in poisoning our hearts and causing us to hate others who might differ with us on minor points. We are trying to preach the gospel of Christ 'in love' and we are constantly praying that God will keep our minds from judgment of our brethren and our lips from speaking the things that will reflect upon the character of our coworkers in the gospel. We shall no more attempt to coerce men to agree with us upon every point of our belief than we should take a gun into the pulpit and force our hearers to accept the gospel we preach. It is ours to proclaim the whole gospel of Christ, the responsibility of acceptance God places upon those who hear. It is our personal conviction that it is our business to 'preach the Word in season and out of season' and leave the results with God."

The New Baptist Hymnal

THE "NEW BAPTIST HYMNAL" is just off the press. We have gone through it with much interest and care. The hymnal is issued by the American Baptist Publication Society and the Sunday-School Board of the Southern Baptist Convention jointly and is designed for use in all Baptist churches of the United States. Evidently the editors who compiled the hymnal had in mind the selective process. Hundreds of hymns that clutter up most of the church hymnals and are never sung have been omitted, and only hymns that the people can sing are retained. We also note with pleasure that virtually everything about which Christian people should sing has a place in the new hymnal. Open the book and scan the pages casually and there are seen hymns that glorify Christ in his birth, life, death and resurrection; hymns that sing the experiences of the Christian life; hymns fitted for the observance of baptism and the Lord's supper; hymns calling the church to its missionary task; hymns emphasizing social welfare; hymns expressing the hope of immortality; and in addition to all these, hymns for the conduct of worship and for evangelistic meetings. The responsive readings are well chosen, beautifully printed and of a reasonable length. Altogether the "New Baptist Hymnal" merits our unstinted praise, and it ought to find a useful place in thousands of our churches.

It is somewhat of a disappointment to discover that some of the old hymns printed in this volume have not been revised. One of them has a slight revision which makes it sing better and is in better taste. We refer to John Newton's verses, "Amazing grace, how sweet the sound, That saved a wretch like me." The editors have wisely substituted the word, "soul" for "wretch." We wish that the same thoughtfulness about the so-called heathen might have led the editors to revise "From Greenland's Icy Mountains." It is hardly fair to perpetuate Heber's fling at Ceylon as though man's vileness were confined to that tropical spot. And is it quite within the region of Christian courtesy to criticize the "heathen" for bowing down to wood and stone when so many Christian (?) Americans bow down to silver and gold? We note also that the editors have allowed to slip by that contradiction in Robert Robinson's, "Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing," where he makes us sing, "Prone to leave the God I love." We are not prone to leave anything we love. Love clings tenaciously to its object. Love is loyal. Proneness to leave the one we profess to love is a denial of love. Why continue to sing this negation of a true Christian experience and this contradiction of the truth? The same criticism is applicable to "Guide me, O thou great Jehovah, Pilgrim through this barren land." Earth is anything but barren. It is beautiful, fertile and attractive, and nobody in his normal state wants to leave it. We are thankful to the compilers for inserting five hymns on "Social Betterment." It is the first time a Baptist hymnal has ever recognized society as a whole, but having made a beginning we may hope the editors in the next edition will balance the multitude of hymns that deal with individualism with as many that stress brotherhood.

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

Not for the Knights of Columbus But for the Sake of Oil

Bravely did the Washington authorities declare that, unmoved by the appeal of the Knights of Columbus, the United States will not interfere in the dispute between the Mexican government and the Catholic church; whereupon the country breathed more easily. But there is the old dispute between the Mexican government and certain citizens of the United States over oil and land rights in Mexico, and the newspapers apprise the country that the government finds the time opportune for "a showdown between that country and the United States" on the subject of those rights. Thus, if the report is true, the churchmen may thank God for the oilmen, and the oilmen for the churchmen, and both for a government in the United States which, with such fine discrimination is able to find a way in their common interest to squeeze the Mexican government.

Trouble Over Those War Debts Will Outlast the Debts

Within a week after the armistice, the writer, in a public address, declared that the war debts never can be paid and never ought to be paid, and was, therefore, politely called a fool. But truth can wait. Now, prominent religious papers are urging cancellation. No less a Christian layman than Mr. Richard H. Edmonds, editor of the Manufacturers' Record, is warmly urging the same thing. There was a time when cancellation could have been so managed as to contribute tremendously toward peace and international good-will. That time may be past. Even so, it is better to do it voluntarily now with such good-will as may appear, than to do it later under necessity in the midst of increased bitterness. There is one factor of embarrassment. If the debtor nations should be released from payment by the United States government, they will immediately go into debt to United States bankers. Then the old complaint is likely to break out in a new form. But people seem to like that way of running the world.

A Belief in Immersion A Foe to Sanity and Grace?

"No man ever yet has been able to defend any one particular mode of baptism as being more scriptural than and superior to any other one mode and do it on the same high intellectual and spiritual caliber on which he does his other writing and thinking. It simply can't be done." So declares the vivacious Herald of Gospel Liberty, and refers to the assistant editor of THE BAPTIST as an interesting example. But is arguing for several "modes" of baptism a more highly intellectual and spiritual act than for one "mode?" He who accepts baptism at all ought to know what he thinks it is. One ought, with no serious damage to his intelligence and spirituality, to be able to say that Christian baptism is what the New Testament says it is. Jesus' baptism was a specific act, chosen by him for reasons of his own. In making that choice and following it out was he exhibiting a low level of his soul? The Herald of Gospel Liberty submits for our consideration the "crucial question, whether immersion is more scriptural as judged by the system of biblical interpretation used by the immersionists themselves on all points under the sun but baptism." Well, "all points under the sun" are a good many points. Immersionists are a numerous and varied group. It does not appear that they have agreed among themselves upon any system of biblical interpretation. But none of them seems to possess that type of intelligence and spirituality which can discover in the New Testament any other baptism than immersion. So far as they are able to see, "it simply can't be done."

Either Speak Now or Do Not Speak at All

To the Presbyterian Magazine credit is due for the following comment on the duty of the churches in these times, and the meaning of the comment is transparent. It says: "We shall never win for our Master the allegiance of the strong men of this world until we show them that he has the power and the purpose to rule the shop, the factory and the counting house as well as the church and the home. If Christianity has a message for industry, now if ever it ought to be fearlessly proclaimed by the churches. If in the face of our industrial needs the churches remain dumb prophets, the working world, which is in thorough earnest today, but is still willing to listen, will turn away. If the churches have nothing to say on the mind of Christ at this critical juncture in the world's life, when nearly everything is in the melting pot, then they must be silent forever.

No Pharisee Ever Carried Self-Praise So Far

Jesus' portrait of the self-righteous Pharisee at prayer has stood for centuries as an unchallenged classic. But a rival has appeared. One of the religious papers, taking its cue from recent editorials in the daily papers, says concerning the alienation of feeling in foreign countries toward the United States: "They have forgotten much of the helpfulness of the United States during the war because of their concentrated attention upon what they owe. History repeats itself in placing the real helper in a bad light before those that were helped. Excessive disfavor often is the reward for helpfulness, but that should not deter a nation from being helpful in needy times." Perhaps it is possible to put smug self-righteousness in more insulting terms. If so they are needed in order to give adequate expression to an American feeling of unrequited and unappreciated goodness. Or was our neighbor editor jesting?

Perhaps the Occupation of Haiti Is Now Explained

Dr. Leo. S. Rowe, director general of the Pan-American Union is said to have made recently this interesting statement about the way the United States came to take control of Haiti: "The military occupation of Haiti can be adequately explained only when it is examined with reference to general world conditions existing in 1915. The great war was raging. The United States was still in the position of a neutral and bent upon maintaining her neutrality. Rumors of all kinds were afloat as to possible complications that might arise if any of the belligerents were to attempt to make a port of Haiti a base of operations. Both consciously and unconsciously the abnormal conditions existing at that time profoundly affected the attitude of the government of the United States." The psychology of the war period is in very vivid remembrance. But what is the present psychology? Is the present condition of affairs in Haiti due to any peculiar hypnosis of the government of the United States? Does the war scare continue in that quarter?

The European Church Looks at Labor

There has never been a period when labor needed the spiritual values in religion more and when the church was more aware of its opportunity.

BY GEORGE STEWART AND ADOLF KELLER

THE socialist ideas of Marx led to an international organization embracing a large part of the workers of Europe. Whether laboring groups organized in trade unions, or in a socialist party, the influence of Marx was a powerful factor. On the Continent, battalions of labor were formed by Lassalle, Engels, Bebel, Jaures, Vandervelde, and Branting. The movement on the Continent aimed at political power earlier than in Great Britain, showing a more hostile attitude to the state, and clinging to a materialistic and irreligious philosophy. Eastern countries with agricultural populations were less accessible to socialistic ideas, nevertheless small radical groups succeeded in exercising an influence among the people. Russia represents a special case in itself.

The rapid formation of national and international socialist parties, and their desire for a complete transformation of the social and economic order, found the churches entirely unprepared and for the most part hostile. The churches, especially on the Continent, let the strategic moment slip by in which to assimilate the new movement.

The materialistic conception of life in the socialist program produced an unsympathetic attitude on the part of the church. The party often declared itself to be neutral on religion, but practically it was hostile toward the church and religion. In the program of Erfurt, which has been for years the official basis of socialistic policy, the materialistic philosophy of Haeckel, Vogt and Buchner was adopted generally by the workers. Religion was despised as an opiate for the people.

The second reason for the early antagonism between church and labor was the refusal of the workers to consider anything but a decisive class-struggle in settling the industrial question. Nothing but a thoroughgoing revolution would satisfy the hopes of large sections of the laboring classes, a condition which still persists in many areas.

The church was so identified with the structure and political aims of the state that it was impossible for it to understand or to collaborate with a party which sought to undermine the foundation of state and church. In vain did far-seeing men attempt to point out that there was a certain element of Christian brotherliness hidden beneath the hostile, anti-religious attitude of the socialists. The latter accused the church of being a class institution in the service of the capitalists and ruling groups. More than 75 per cent of the working class in large cities have given up all connection with the church, which they consider one of the main obstacles in the way to social progress.

Social Efforts within the Churches

The churches, led by Fallot, Kingsley, Wichern, Bodelschwingh, have undertaken a large social work in the Inner Mission. This charitable work has not, however, included any conviction as to the necessity of transforming the whole social order. Lutheranism has been particularly reluctant to espouse such ideas because it has been genuinely opposed to revolutionary transformations and to all efforts tending to improve the present world, which one is bound to accept. Lutheran Protestantism has often been criticized as having no social ethics or as having only ethics embracing obedience to God. Lutheranism has never considered it the task of the church to take the lead in social reform. Its social conservatism and its attachment to the monarchy have prevented a thoroughgoing social movement within this church, although it abounds in works of brotherly love.

In Germany, toward the end of the last century, great social improvements were made by the state itself, at which time a forward movement was begun by the Inner Mission. The economic and industrial problems were studied by different organizations, which tried to find a synthesis between the social claims of labor and the gospel.

The Evangelical Social Congress in Germany was founded in 1890 by men like Stocker, Max Weber, Harnack, Rade, Baumgarten, and von Soden. The permanent congress remained a center of social studies of a somewhat academic character for a period of thirty-five years. Its publications reveal the tendencies of a large part of European Protestantism in response to the new socialist movement. The congress requested the church to keep in close contact with the facts of the modern economic system, science, and the material and psychological condition of capitalism and socialism, and to abstain from forming idealistic programs. It was denied that the gospel as such contains a program of economic transformation. The main social impulse of the gospel is its message of the unique value of the soul and human personality, of faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of men. This defines the task of the church, which has to preach the application of the gospel in the spirit of Christ to the conditions of the workers. The congress was split when Stocker and Naumann separated and founded their own organization with similar aims.

The influence of these organizations remained confined more or less to academic circles and did not change the attitude of labor toward Christianity. Nor did the breaking up of the old state churches. It was hoped on the Continent that disestablishment would change the hostility of labor to the church, but such hopes were vain. Established and disestablished churches remain for the workers in the same condemnation as before. They cannot forget the former indifference of the church and its attack on "faithless" social-democracy.

The Religious Social Movement

Even before this experience it became obvious to small groups of religious socialists, especially in Switzerland but also in Germany, France, Holland and other countries, that no reconciliation was possible between labor and religion as long as the fundamental claims of the socialists for justice were not accepted by Christian people. A new movement arose, the religious social movement, stimulated by men like Kutter, Ragaz, Fuchs, Tillich, Mennicke, Gout, Wilfred Monod, Elie Gounelle, and Beskow, who advocated a new understanding of the socialistic claims. The question was no more how to win back the labor masses for the church or how to mitigate the hardness of life by innumerable works of Christian love, but how to interpret an apparent un-Christian movement as an expression of the deeper claims of social justice and brotherly love contained in the gospel.

Small groups of pastors inscribed themselves as members of the socialist party to show their willingness to expiate the sins of the church in its lack of understanding. Their zeal for practical activity and their willingness to participate in political struggles were an expression of their hope to win the confidence of labor and to bring to labor a new religious faith in the place of the materialistic unbelief with which this idealistic movement was connected. They threw in their lot with the effort to transform the social order, which had grown intolerable to Christian consciences. Socialism became for them a means of fulfilling God's will. This religious socialism shares the aims of political socialism, but not its motives. It stands, in the name of the gospel, for the ideals of socialism as against capitalism, but it fights the materialistic spirit of the social democratic party quite as well as the reactionary spirit of Christian and ecclesiastic conservatism.

The general tendencies of this religious social movement were parallel in all the western countries, but the work was done on a national basis prior to the Copec and Stockholm conferences. In France the group of religious socialists, inspired by men like T. Fallot, Ch. Gide, Wilfred Monod, L. Comte, Roberty, and R. Allier, had formed the Association Protestante pour l'Etude et l'Action Sociale in 1887 with a practical program published in 1910, similar to the social manifesto of the American Federal Council and the Copec conclusions. The association is publishing a review entitled Christianisme Social, edited by Elie Gounelle, and is multiplying a great many individual efforts to Christianize the social order. They have received much inspiration from the books of the late Walter Rauschenbusch. They conceive the task of the church to be against any social order which eliminates the values wrapped up in human personality. They advocate support of the justified claims of labor and seek to inspire the socialist movement with the idealistic spirit of the gospel. Churches are asked to manifest a sympathetic understanding of the well-defined aims of the workers and not to confine themselves to publishing general and meaningless declarations of good-will. "Elle doit entrer dans la melee" (She should enter the fray), is the slogan of the group. Its first task is to educate men and women for a new social order. "We, the churches of Christ, in an inexpressible feeling of our misery and our shortcomings, but called by God to evangelize the world, have to teach all those engaged in the social struggles the sacred duty of cooperation. We have, according to the incomparable manual of the perfect worker, the gospel, to educate the men capable of service and sacrifice who are wanted in industry and commerce for preparing the cooperative republic in which one day the ideal of justice and divine kindness of the kingdom will be manifested."¹ These ideals are practiced in France by a number of social agencies, such as La Cause, and by a lay order, Les Veilleurs, founded by Wilfred Monod, whose members take a vow to live according to the spirit of the sermon on the mount.

The Double Task

The French propagators of the social gospel are less radical in their judgment of the present form of the church than some of the leaders in Switzerland, and, of late, in Germany. Although they are aware that the church, socially conservative, has lost great opportunities and thrust off great obligations for social leadership, yet, in the words of Elie Gounelle, one of the distinguished leaders of the Social Christianity movement in France, "our love, and zeal, and devotion for the churches must double, and we must stay there at whatever cost, even though they may leave us unsatiated: because we cannot find something better, and because the churches, too, not any less than the heathen, must be evangelized." He warns the church, lest it should be found obdurate, like the "first-born" Israel, to the message of Christ. Charles Gide, the famous sociologist and advocate of the cooperative system, and the senior leader of the French Social Christian movement, has defined the double task of his friends. "You are laboring," he said, "for two things: first, to show to the masses that are unbelievers that there is a Christian religion which is necessary, and a second and yet more difficult task, to show the Christian bourgeois that there is a socialism that is necessary."

The Copec Conference and the Churches

Another aspect of this movement took form in the Copec Conference in Birmingham in 1924. Labor in England did not show the same antipathy to the churches as on the Continent. The anti-religious bias of the workers at its worst cannot be compared with the hatred of their Continental fellow workers.

Labor in England, when it organized itself politically, took up an independent attitude to religion, but accusations that the churches were the strongest protagonists of the classes against the masses were often heard, in spite of the practical and far-sighted social works and charitable enterprises both in the church of England and in the free churches.

Such accusations are no longer justified since the Copec Conference tried to group all social efforts within the churches and to concentrate the social interest on definite points of social reconstruction. The Christian Social Union had one representative of these tendencies within the church of England and other Christian communions have corresponding organizations.

The conference as a whole made it clear as never before that the church has a "social function, that the Christian battle is against the world, equally with the flesh and the devil, that the gospel has not merely a social application, but social implications." Copec faced in different fields the practical issues that arise when the sphere of general statements is left and practical work is attempted. In the work of this conference great attention was given to the discussion of Christian doctrines and their social bearings. The conference admitted that the "industrial and economic society is, from the standpoint of Christian principles, not merely defective but vicious and radically un-Christian and we must therefore labor not for a mere mitigation of these evils by the use of palliatives, but for a fundamental, though no doubt gradual transformation of its character and organization."¹

What for a long time had been the preoccupation of single individuals and groups became, after the Copec Conference, a task with which the churches as a whole feel concerned. Following Copec, the German Church Federation issued a social message in 1924, although under Lutheran influence great care was taken not to enter too deeply into technical questions and to recognize that the economic and industrial system has its own laws which must be respected.

The Conference on Life and Work

The last and most powerful manifestation of a new social consciousness of the churches was the Life and Work Conference in Stockholm. This meeting was evidently a turning point in church history in so far as organized Christianity assumes the social responsibility which is laid on it by the gospel. The churches confessed their shortcomings and declared their willingness to apply the teachings of Christ to the whole of human activity.

Here again was a noticeable difference between the conception of the social function of the church as described by Anglo-American groups and the ideas of Continental Lutherans. This different conception is to be found in a different interpretation of the nature of the kingdom of ¹Elie Gounelle, in "L'Eglise et les Problemes Economiques Industriels et Sociaux 1925."

¹See also the fifth Interim Report of the Archbishops' Committee and the report of the same committee on "The Church and Social Service, 1920."

God and its relationship to the world. For the churches from central and eastern Europe, the kingdom is of an apocalyptic nature. It comes at the end of this aeon, without human collaboration. Even the best human moral and social efforts cannot accelerate its coming. It is not a result of human evolution and has nothing to do even with our best social reforms and our moral or religious improvement. It is a judgment and a gift of God—a judgment on the world, which will last with its evils to the end.

Christianity conceives of the kingdom of God as a transformation of this world, rendered possible by the application of the best of our moral and religious methods, through human good-will and social reform divinely reinforced. With a refusal of any human collaboration and with a merely apocalyptic interpretation of the kingdom, practical action is hampered and social progress becomes doubtful.

This passive attitude is not only due to genuine Lutheran quietism, but to the strong influence of the theology of Kark Barth and his group. They are opposed categorically to any attempt to introduce the divine into the substance and process of this world. It remains transcendent, more or less, until the day when the divine forces make their irruption into this unholy world to transform it miraculously from above. Ethical, constructive thinking, as well as social programs, is therefore criticized as an expression of Christian pride, a human invention, whereas a humble renunciation of the attempt to find a solution for the problems of the world order would be more appropriate.

Whether either the Protestant church or the Catholic will achieve a rapprochement with militant labor in the near future is problematic. Certainly there has never been a period when labor needed the spiritual values in religion more and when the church was more aware of its opportunity. The survival of ancient prejudices and the disarming of mutual suspicion will be a slow but necessary task.

The Secret Place of the Most High

By J. F. WEINMANN

PRAYER is assembling things—anything and everything—in the Divine Presence and there setting upon them their true value, relationship, and incidence. Prayer is taking things up and back to God, as to one who sees from the beginning to the end, and all along in between, as to one who is not to be outdone, and who cannot be baffled. It is much like the act of a child who takes a tangled skein to one older and wiser in the assurance that the ravel can be unraveled. Prayer is the most natural and childlike thing we do. We fail; others fail; the wisest often are at the end of their wits; but not God. Sensing this through that mysterious reference (act of referring) of the soul that all understand by the name of faith, the soul takes things high up, to the Highest, into the Holy of Holies, and there spreads them out—before God.

There is nothing new in this. It is, in fact, old. All along through the ages of the soul's effort toward God, the soul's striving to adjust itself to life through first adjusting itself to the Unseen, this practice stands out in a clearly defined line. Read, for instance, what Isaiah says in an early chapter (4:6), "There shall be a tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain." Or see what a psalm of David says (31:20), "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues." Or a similar psalm (27:5), "In the time of trouble He shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of His tabernacle shall He hide me: He shall set me up upon a rock" (off, high, aloof, alone for adjustment and re-appraisal). Fail not also to recall the words of our Lord, "Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and, when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly" (Matt. 6:6). What are all these but evidences and counsels of this very matter of retiring to be alone, in the innermost silences of the soul, with God, there to assemble all the hopes, the fears, the vexations, the ambitions, the failures, the sins, the doubts, the successes of life!

Always there may be this tabernacle, this inner pavilion, of the soul, this refuge and covert from what Isaiah calls storm and rain; always, off alone by one's self, in crowds, or in church, especially before and in the presence of the sacrament.

Here, then, is a power untouched by and independent of the changes and chances of this mortal life. Here is an assurance and a dependence that knows no failure while life shall last and that is an earnest, a foretaste, of that other plane of the soul—that rest that remaineth—when we shall see no more darkly but face to face, when we shall know even as we are known.

We say an assurance that knows no failure. We may and do fail one another, not always willingly or deliberately, but through incompetence. We have difficulties of our own and forget or neglect "the shows of love to other men." The usual securities and expectations of life fail us. Nothing certainly continues in one stay. All that is material and social may easily, and all too often does readily, fail us and prove a broken reed. Not so this refuge; it continues.

And what charity this secret refuge gives us toward our brethren, with their own cares, their own vexations, and storms of soul. How we crave to share with them this vision of the inner tabernacle, this secret pavilion of the Most High within the soul, which is every one's right every one's heritage from the great past of discovery and reality. What peace this brings and poise, and bringing peace and poise, what power.

"And there arose a great storm of wind, and the waves beat into the ship . . . and he was in the higher part of the ship asleep on a pillow . . . and they waked him, and said unto him, 'Master, carest thou not that we perish?' and he arose, and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, 'Peace, be still.' And the wind ceased, and there was a great calm. And he said unto them, 'Why are ye so fearful? How is it that ye have no faith?'"—Living Church.

THE Quakers possessed the land and were richly blessed. They sought no honor, but they found it; they sought no riches, but found them, and some of them became independently rich. God blessed them spiritually and materially, for they honored him and were loved and respected for their fidelity to the truth, their transparent Christian life and conduct, their simplicity and honesty. Much of what they had reaffirmed and proclaimed has become common property as for instance: the affirmation in the place of judicial oaths; the equality of women in the church; religious liberty, not simply toleration; a practical belief in the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit.

"The Religion of Christ"

"My food is to do the will of him who sent me."—John 4:34

By W. C. BITTING

PERHAPS a great definition of "greatness" is contained in Basil Williams' preface to Lord Charnwood's "Abraham Lincoln," when, referring to that wonderful personality, he said: "He was misunderstood and underrated in his life-time, and even yet has hardly come to his own. For his place is among the great men of the earth. To them he belongs by right of his immense power of hard work, his unfaltering pursuit of what seemed to him right, and above all by that childlike directness and simplicity of vision which none but the greatest carry beyond their earliest years."

The mission of "The Church" is a great one, but, unfortunately, it has not always been worthy of this definition of greatness. On a gloomy January Sunday morning, a clergyman, who, after forty-four years "on the firing line"—starting with a little Virginia church whereat he both preached and played the organ—is now entirely "free," extemporaneously preached a simple, direct "childlike" sermon. It is worth preserving — he was kind enough to dictate it afterward as best he could. It is reproduced here.

WHAT was the personal religion of Jesus? The question seems strange to most of his followers; first, because his present disciples think of him as a teacher, aviator, or some "far-away" being who has some "official" relation of some sort to human life. They have been mostly impressed with the function of Jesus in letting them into heaven or keeping them out of hell. He is considered a convenience for trouble—for the closing hours of life. The thought that he had—and lived—his own personal religion, does not occur to most of his disciples or to those who are not his disciples.

Again, the idea of religion itself has been so mixed up with creeds, dogmas, forms and ceremonies, organizations—such as the church—that men have spent their energies in disputes about all these things, and in the smoke of their battles have lost sight of religion itself. Jesus had, and lived, his own personal religious life. The literary records of his life easily reveal what this religion was. Any intelligent reader of the story of his life, any thoughtful student of his words, any one who seeks to know his attitude toward men, will quickly come to the conviction that the personal religion of Jesus consisted in his filial spirit toward God.

His first recorded words are those when he was a boy twelve years old. He had gone to Jerusalem with his parents. When they were returning to their home in Nazareth, they missed the boy from their company after some days of travel. They returned to Jerusalem, and found him in the temple with the teachers, who were astonished at the questions he asked them and the answers he gave to their questions. When his mother told him how they had missed him, and gently chided him, he asked them where else they would expect him to be than in his father's house. (Luke 2:40-52.) On the cross, when he died, his last words were, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (Luke 23:46.)

The Father

He lived in the consciousness that God was his Father. He had no other word for God. To him God was no judge, or lawgiver, or taskmaster, nor did he think of him in any philosophic way. Always, and everywhere, God was such a being as could be most accurately described in terms of his relation to men as a father. If the social position of women had been in Palestine in the first century what it is in the United States today, he would also have, no doubt, used the word "Mother" to describe the divine affection for all men. It is thus noteworthy that Jesus never tried to describe God in terms of philosophy, but in terms of human life, and, in doing this, he seized upon the parental relation—the highest known to the men of his day—as the vehicle for letting them share the secret of his own life. He told the people plainly, "As the living Father sent me, and I live through the Father; so he that eats me, he also shall live through me." (John 5:57.) By eating him, he meant such fellowship with him as he had with the Father. He had no reference to believing in creeds or dogmas, or submitting to rites or ceremonies, or putting ourselves under the jurisdiction of any form of church government. These things are the garment of religion, or part of the embroidery that men have tried to work according to the patterns of their thinking and fancies upon that garment.

His Father sent the rain and the sunshine, clothed the flowers with beauty, attended the funeral of every bird that fell to the ground. His greatest story was one of a father whose son went away from home, but who was always loving his boy and daily watching for the return of the poor fellow who foolishly tried the experiment of having his own way instead of living the life of sonship to his father. (Luke 15:11-32.) Throughout his life he tried to impress upon those who lived with him and listened to him, the beautiful fact that the real religion of his own soul consisted in that filial spirit toward God, whom he thought of and acted toward as a being with a heart like that of a father.

This meant many things for him practically in his own religious life. The significance of it can never be exhausted.

Absolute Trust

He had faith in his Father. It was just such a vital, living, joyous, comforting, practical faith as a true child today has in a loving father and mother. God was his parent whom he trusted absolutely. In his poverty, his faith in God was his boundless wealth. In his temptations, his faith in God was his invincible armor. In the plan of his life, his faith in his Father was the determining element. Whatever the word "father" meant to a child, he idealized into perfection, and gave himself up to such a faith in his heavenly Father as is only faintly mirrored in the faith of any child in his parents.

His religion of the filial spirit meant the joy of communion with his Father. This fellowship and communion were the vital principles in Jesus' religion. He loved to study nature and to see how his Father was acting in the physical universe as it was understood at that time, and longed to live in accordance with the habits of his Father as he saw them in the sky and on the earth and in the lives of all animals and men.

His communion with his Father was in his thinking. He often talked to his Father, expressed his own thoughts, wishes and desires, but always added as the climax of all his talking to God, "Not my will but thine be done." He never tried to tease his Father into his own way of thinking. He never begged his Father for a long list of material blessings. His one supreme joy was in his communion and sense of fellowship with his Father, and his superlative happiness was to see the will of his Father accomplished.

He wanted to do the will of his Father. This was what he meant by obedience. His obedience was his desire to carry out the will of his Father, knowing that the will of such a wise and loving Father was the best thing for his own life and for the lives of all men. He declared that he had come to this world to do the will of his Father, by which he simply meant that the one mission of his life, that summed up and included all conceptions of his career in the world, was to make men acquainted with the loving Father he had and to get them to share with him the ideals of this loving Father in their personal lives, in their characters and in their relations to others.

Jesus knew that God was the Father of men and therefore, that he was related to them morally and spiritually, and that they were his brothers. Selfishness had no place in his soul, but he gave himself constantly to others and for them. Thus his religion took on the practical form of service to men. He had no ambition to be a superior. On one occasion when his unintelligent followers, not realizing the meaning of the life of Jesus, were disputing among themselves as to who should be the greatest, he declared that such a spirit was not his spirit, and also said that he did not live in the world to have people serve him, but to serve them, that the greatest person was the one who was willing to be everybody's slave. (Mark 10:35-45.)

It is remarkable that Jesus asked all his followers to share this religion of his life with him. He wants us, like him, to have faith in the Father, communion with the Father, the spirit of obedience to the Father, and loving service to our fellow men.

The Only Religion

We can hardly call anything else religion than this personal religion of Jesus. It is the only kind of religion that will bring his followers together, that will overcome the spirit of evil in our hearts, that will banish from the world the ugly things which we vainly try to overcome by reformation and legislation. It is for making known this personal religion of Jesus that churches and church members exist. It is not to propagate economic or reformatory ideas. It is simply to live in this world the same religion that Jesus lived.

One who knows the life of Louis Pasteur cannot fail to be stirred. He will wonder whether to admire this great man most as a disciple of science with the relentless devotion to reality and willingness to pay any cost to get it, or as a giver of all he was and knew to the welfare of humanity, or as a noble man. Whether in helping farmers, or manufacturers or stockraisers, or the sick in hospitals, his spirit of philanthropy was consuming. His life revealed those eternal qualities which made him untiring in his search for scientific reality and ungrudging in the gift of all he obtained to the welfare of his fellow men. He blessed humanity by his discoveries. He increased human wealth and decreased human suffering, and enabled us to prevent misery and pain. Every physician, every hospital, bears witness to his scientific attainments and to his generosity in giving all he had to his fellow men. Here in scientific realms is a noble illustration of the essentially religious spirit of service supremely revealed in the personal religion of Jesus. Every life should be held by its possessor in trust for all humanity. In moral and ethical realms Jesus has been and ever will be supreme. In scientific realms men like Pasteur show us the essentially religious character of the unselfish spirit of self-dedication to all humanity. The same is true of men in industrial, intellectual and social realms. The spirit itself in whatever region it is exercised is essentially religious.

No wonder, then, that the first word Jesus spoke, as the very gateway to our entrance into his own life, was "Repent." You love evil and so you cannot share my filial spirit with the Father and my fraternal relations with men. Therefore, change your heart, change your mind. You are unforgiving, and yet God is full of forgiveness. You must change your heart and become forgiving, else my Father, who knows the value of the forgiving spirit, will not cast his pearls before swine and give that which is holy to dogs. If it seem reckless extravagance to throw jewels into a sty, or to take the bread from the altar and give it to the dogs, how much more profane it is to throw the jewels of my Father's heart to the human swine, or to give the bread on which my Father lives and on which I live to the human dogs. If your life is set upon the material things of this world and they can satisfy all the aspirations of your soul, change your heart, repent. If you think you can realize the end of your being with all of its splendid physical, intellectual and social powers by devoting yourself to what gives momentary pleasure to your physical senses, change your heart, change your mind, turn away from all such views of life. The urgency of Jesus in telling men to change their hearts and change their minds was no doctrinal device. It was a simple, common-sense necessity that he urged upon us, if we are to share his life in its filial spirit toward the heavenly Father and its fraternal spirit toward our fellow men.

The Greater Love

Not long ago a business man had his wife call me on the telephone, saying that he wanted to talk with me. When I called upon him, his wife and daughter were present. The latter was a little girl, nine years old. He could not talk louder than a whisper. A well-known physician had told him that he had a cancer on his vocal cords, that the only hope for relief lay in an operation and the chance were "even" whether he would recover from it. When in his whisper he reached that place in his story, his wife could no longer stand it, but left the room. He continued in his whisper to me: "Day before yesterday I made my will. I have settled all my business affairs. I am going to the hospital tomorrow morning. I want some help in my spiritual condition. I face the unknown."

The little girl sat on my lap, and apparently ignoring what her father had said, I began to talk to her, and said, "Mary Katherine, you look well-fed. Do you get enough to eat? Aren't you worried about your breakfast tomorrow morning?"

She smilingly said, "Oh, no, my Daddy gives me all that I can eat."

Then I played with her dress and said, "You have a nice school dress, but some day that will wear out. Aren't you worried about where your clothes are coming from?"

"Oh, no," she replied, "my mother makes all my dresses, and she will give me another one when this wears out."

"You must have a good father and mother," I said.

"There are none so good in the world as my daddy and my mother," she promptly answered.

I then said to her, "Mary, where is your Bible?" She slid down off my lap and went for her Bible. I turned to my friend and asked, "Did you hear what Mary Katherine said?"

He was looking rather blankly at me. Possibly he wondered whether that was all I had to say to a man who knew the seriousness of his physical condition, and whether I had no other message for him. When Mary Katherine came back with the Bible I opened it at Matthew 7:9-11. I said, "My friend, I want to read you a few words that Jesus spoke. It summed up his own religion, and he meant it to describe the kind that you and I should live. I am going to read these words, translating them into the language of St. Louis, which you can understand. Imagine him standing at a busy downtown corner. A crowd is around him, wondering what that man is trying to do. He looks upon the crowd, sees it composed of men and women like us, and he looks you squarely in the eye and says, 'What parent is there of you, who, if your child asks bread, will hunt around on the street for a stone, and give your child that to eat? Or, if your own offspring asks a piece of fish, will hunt around until you find a wriggling snake, and hand that to your child to eat?'" I could see a little shudder in the large body of my friend at the very thought that he would give his child a cobblestone or a poisonous snake for food. His father's heart rebelled against such a preposterous idea.

I read the next verse to him. "If you, then, for all that you know about evil, and imperfect as you are, know how to give good things to Mary Katherine, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to all his children."

Then my friend buried his face in the hair of his child, who nestled up to him with a childlike love and faith and trust in her father. Through his sobs, I heard him whisper to his child, "Precious little girlie, never mind anything that I have ever brought to you. It is nothing. But who would ever have thought that you would have brought God to me!" After a minute he looked up at me with his wet eyes, and whispered, "It is all right. I now know that I have nothing to fear."

I told him that all he had to do at the hospital, and when he came out of it and entered once more into the struggles of life, was to remember, and to live every day in every event and experience, those three words, "how much more," and his own parent's heart would tell him more about how God felt toward him than all the sermons that ever could be preached. For God had given him that little daughter in order that through his own parental feeling he might come to know how God felt toward him.

He looked at me with a smile and said, "Is this religion?" I answered, "That is the kind that Jesus lived—he wants us to share its joys with him."

Choir Suggestions

Overcome slouching postures. Bear in mind the congregation is observant. To be seated with the congregation without offering a satisfactory reason to the organist should be equivalent to a resignation.

Jesting or loud talking, either before or after the close of the service, should be discouraged.

Speak a bright cheery word to as many as possible at the close of the service.

Never criticise any part of the church service, unless you have studied the problem, and are positive you have something better to offer. It is only the false critic who finds fault. Surely, there is always something helpful in any church service; speak of that; forget that part of the service which does not appeal to you.

Let us endeavor to serve our church better tomorrow than today; to be alive in every part of our being; to realize the possibilities that are in us; to do all that we can; to become all that we are capable of becoming; to have an exalted ideal and work with enthusiasm to attain it.

—I. H. Bartholomew

From the Volunteers' Gazette, organ of the Volunteers of America, comes this warning note: "It is regrettable—it is more, it is a calamity—that in this growingly rich and progressive country so many thousands of girls of high-school age should have to make weary pilgrimages through city and town in search of jobs. The percentage who fail in their quest forms an alarming problem. The report of the officials of the Girls' Service League of America makes the statement that in New York City alone as many as 120,000 seek work all through the summer months. If this is the aggregate in this city, what must be the proportion of out-of-job girls throughout the country?" Any community that has a single high-school girl unable to find a job is an inefficient community. If this statement of conditions is not exaggerated, then the cry of the jobless girl will be added to the chorus of condemnation which will blast this nation when its judgment day comes.

Five Loaves

"He said, bring them hither to me."—Matthew 18:14

"HOW many loaves have ye,
And fishes?"—"None but small,
Only enough for me,
They'd feed no crowd at all"—
Might not the Master's touch
Fill baskets to the brim,
Make of thy little, much,
If all were brought to him?

Tiny are germs of seed,
Yet at the touch of spring,
As sun and shower succeed
The harvest's gold they bring—
Thy gifts though small, no doubt,
Mere germs ye underrate,
Christ would not be without,
Trust him for harvests great.

O thou of little faith
And selfish fears of loss,
Bring all to me, he saith,
Give, and take up thy cross—
Spare not one fish or crumb,
The hungering must be fed,
To outcries be not dumb—
He is himself the bread.

Timid—yet speak thy word,
Some soul may hear and live,
Thy faintest prayer be heard,
In love thy morsel give—
Survey thy little store,
Search heart and life to see Could'st thou not bring him more?
"How many loaves have ye?"

The Devotional Life

Shadows

BY RALPH M. JONES

THERE is only one case in the Bible, so far as I recall, where the human shadow is spoken of as an efficacious agent. I refer to the shadow of Peter. We are told that the Jews brought their sick to him, after the startling death of Ananias and Sapphira, confident that the mere imposition of his shadow would effect a cure. It is not related that any cures were made after this fashion but it is hardly strange that such a notion should be held by simple-minded people whose incredulity regarding the miraculous had been dissipated already. Peter's shadow has always been accepted, therefore, as a symbol of that unconscious influence which a man flings like a shadow across the lives of other men.

Not less intangible or inalienable is one's unconscious influence over the lives of others. We cannot any more get rid of it or put it away from us than we can detach our shadows.

Tall Men's Shadows

I have in memory the figure, tall, spare, straight, of our college president. He held rather aloof from student life except as his official duties demanded an occasional contact not always congenial. But he exercised a profound influence over the mind of the student body. Let a student utter an oath; the appearance of that tall figure in the distance would fill him with uneasy shame. Let a coarse story be related, or in process of relation; the sight of Doctor Sawyer would cleanse at once the current of our thought. He was too far away to hear; but his shadow touched us; the unconscious influence of a good and gracious personality was flung across our lives. Tall men cast tall shadows.

Think of the shadows of Lincoln and Washington, as they are flung across the years. They were tall men and they had a right to tall shadows, but their shadows are infinitely taller than themselves. They fall upon our nation and we become better patriots and nobler citizens and finer Americans.

Think of the shadow of Christ. It is related that on the occasion of his crucifixion there was darkness over all the land for the space of three hours. Such a grim and ominous shadow as the suffering Saviour cast! Perhaps it was the shadow of the wrath and grief of God! But this greater and more perpetual shadow of Christ of which I speak is not like that; it is filled rather with unceasing benediction and grace for all the sons of men on whom it rests. It is the shadow of one who stoops in sympathy above the sick; who lays his hand of pity on the desperate and banished woman; who beckons peasants and publicans and fishermen into a kingdom; who teaches on a green hillside with a little group of men about him; who bows his head in an agony of broken prayer; who lies extended on a cross for our salvation. Nay, it is not the shadow of a man at all. It is the shadow of God. At least it is the shadow of one who, standing at the right hand of God the Father Almighty, flings his shadow out across the world!

Who can measure the influence of the church? The body of Christ must throw a shadow comparable to his own. I remember passing my own church one night when the moon was low in the sky, and the shadow of the church was flung across the street. And I said: "The shadow of the church is taller than the church itself!" And so it is. No man can measure the influence of a church in a community by the number of its worshippers. The shadow of the church is taller than itself; the shadow of its faith and its ideals as it is flung athwart the lives of men. People may seem indifferent. They may even profess to scorn it. But it touches them with the cool fingers of God and they are changed.

The Shadow of God.

The psalmist tells us that he who dwells in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of God. Several times the shadow of his hand is mentioned, and once, the shadow of his wings. We look up from our task, or our sorrow, or our doubt, and lo, the cool shadow of the great pinions of God are spread above his little ones.

The shadow of God involves certain gracious implications. It implies humility. No pride or self-conceit can endure under that great shadow. There can be no community of feeling between the man who seeks a place in the sun, and he who hides in the shadow of God. Jesus tells us that our light must so shine as to conceal ourselves and to show only our good works and the kindness of our heavenly Father. In God's shadow then we must discover such a measure of humility as is consistent with productive service.

Secondly, God's shadow implies rest and quietude. Men prophesy a great revival in the church this year. I hope it sweeps men quietly out of the heat of the day, out of the fret and turmoil and jar and jangle of life, into the shadow of God, into the cool and gracious shelter of the Rock of Ages.

God's shadow implies companionship and tolerance. Men may quarrel and fight out where the sun is hot. But the hot temper is cooled and controversy dies when they stretch out together in the shade. Is it not the same great shadow that falls on all of them? Are they not alike subject to the sheltering grace of God?

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topic for October 3 CHRIST THE DIVINE KING

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in the Young People's Leader, the official magazine for all Baptist young people. Subscriptions to the Leader may be made through the B. Y. P. U. of America, at $1 per year.)

In meeting, after the worship period of songs, prayer, scripture, etc., the leader may give a sort of introduction to the topic, which is a study of the Book of Matthew, by telling something of Matthew's material, methods, etc., as given in the Leader. Then an announcement could be made to the effect that a geometry problem would be submitted to those present to be worked out.

Either the leader or a group member could write the problem on the board as follows:

Given: Old Testament prophecies; a Man; a doubtful nation.

To Prove: That the Man is the King mentioned in the prophecies.

Proof:

The first two statements could be read by the writer, who is to act as "teacher" by calling for the proofs. The proof may be worked out as follows: Scripture references from both the Old and New Testament may be given out previously or those present may volunteer to look up the passages. These may be (according to the selections given in the Leader): Isaiah 7:14 to parallel Matthew 1:22-23; Micah 5:2 for Matthew 2:5-6; Isaiah 42:1 for Matthew 12:18-21; Isaiah 9:1-2 for Matthew 4:14-16; Isaiah 53:4 for Matthew 8:18; and Psalms 68:2 for Matthew 13:35. It may be that those who read the passages would like to offer explanations or comments briefly. Perhaps you will want to find other references in Matthew which are fulfillments of Old Testament prophecies and add these to the "proof."

As the leader calls for the prophecy, this may be read, immediately followed by the fulfillment. Either the complete verses or the references may be placed under the word "Proof" on the board. Under this "Proof" also place the references made to the kingdom as given in the Leader. One or two examples of people of today may be given, showing that in their lives Christ is the divine King.

Use the rest of the material in the Leader for the conclusion, showing the young people clearly that Christ is the divine King for which the people were looking.

Perhaps the young people could be asked, in closing, to prove to the world that he is King—to prove this by their daily living and deeds of service.

Echoes from Arizona

During the middle of August, Arizona Baptists from all directions struck the Superior highway wending the mountain trail to Summit camp, eighty miles east of Phoenix. The altitude of Pinal mountain brought a decided relief from the temperature of the valley.

It was the warmth of friendships, old and new, that took the chill from the early morning air. Family camps were established and all enjoyed the midday shade, the running water and the shower baths.

But of all the groups that gathered around a skillet of bacon and fried eggs, there was none more ravenous than the assembly faculty. Where is there another assembly dean like Myrtle Love who can preside with such poise, lead vespers of such power, make announcements so prolific and cook with such skill?

Many volunteers helped with the final tasks of setting up camp, pitching tents, putting up cots and dusting benches until all was in readiness when the bell rang for the opening session on "Get Acquainted Night." The four groups of "Giggers," "Smilers," "Laughers" and "Grinners" made further introduction unnecessary.

The Brockway memorial chapel car was welcome, and made a real contribution to the assembly through the use of its chapel tent for classroom work and through the services of its colporter in the direction of recreation.

Four class periods followed the general assembly and Bible study each morning. Many enthusiastic students spent afternoons in preparing homework and in reading for teacher training credit. The work of the missionary field was brought near through the mother of one of Arizona's own girls, May Coggins, now of the Philippines. The daily round of a mission station in Southern India was made real through personal acquaintance with Rev. J. A. Curtis.

The Christian Life Program seemed within the reach of every group of young people, after those days of class discussion together. The radiant lives of former members made it easy for others to reach the decision for life service.

With the ring of assembly music still in our ears, with the memory of the clever stunts and delightful people, there lingers in our souls a depth of longing to know anew the Master of life and to follow his way regardless of the cost.

West Washington Assembly

By T. H. HAGEN

THE West Washington Assembly Aug. 3-13 was considered by those privileged to attend the best ever held in West Washington. The actual registration was 426, while the attendance of visitors on Sunday and over the week-end brought the total well over the 800 mark. One hundred and sixty-three certificates were awarded for successful notebook work, certified to by members of the faculty. At the close of an address given by Dr. J. E. Dillard of Birmingham, Ala., 110 young people went forward and joined the West Washington chapter of the Life Service League of the B. Y. P. U. of A.

Members of the faculty included Dr. J. E. Dillard whose course on "The Modern Minister and His Problems" was attended by a large group of pastors; Dr. O. C. Brown, Philadelphia; Dr. M. L. Thomas, San Francisco; Dr. W. J. Sly, McMinnville, Ore.; Rev. Eric N. Linholm, Seattle; Miss Louise Campbell, China; Miss Louise Hunderup, Portland, Ore.; Rev. W. E. Cochran, Tacoma; Mrs. F. C. Davidson, Miss Winifred Myers, Seattle; Rev. S. L. Nelson, Mt. Vernon; Mrs. W. E. Pettibone, Tacoma; and Miss Isabelle Crawford, New York City. Miss Eva Main, Port Angeles, had charge of the assembly vacation school.

During the year a building to house the faculty had been erected, making seven buildings on the assembly grounds. Millard P. Thomas made announcement of the gift by Miss Kittie Walker of Tacoma, of a new classroom building to the assembly, which will be erected during the coming year.

A new feature this year was the assembly banquet held in the social hall the last evening. More than 300 remained for the occasion. Addresses reporting the Los Angeles convention were given by Harold Morrison, Miss Dorothy Greene and Miss Hattie Fitzgerald. Mr. Paul E. Edquist of Seattle, the newly elected president of the West Washing-

The Chimney Corner

(A remarkable series of articles on the Sahara desert have been appearing in the magazine ASIA, by Angus Buchanan. From one of these the following is taken.)

The Waters of the Desert

By ANGUS BUCHANAN

"The Sahara is not, as is often popularly supposed, merely sand. Its desolate plains are relieved by rocks and by remarkable mountain groups, such as Air, Ahaggar and Tibesti."

AS so often happens in the Sahara, our caravan was desperately in want of water. Having lately detected a frayed rope and some pellets of wasted camel-dung, we were fairly certain of having picked up an old trail. Some hours later we passed a number of heaps of stones piled by human hands: the token stones of grateful wayfarers who had slaked their thirst in the desert and surreptitiously left behind this expression of their thanks. The Tuaregs say that most of these token heaps are the work of slaves, who, thinking of the possibility of escape, in this way endeavored to mark the places of water over the route by which they were borne as captives. Nevertheless, few nomads of the land today, having drunk their fill, will pass without stooping to add further stones to the piles that sit, like symbols of some weird religion, in their path.

Two camels shot ahead of the line. Wild, saddle-perfect Tuarebs rode them at a swinging trot. They meant to return, with goatskins of water, to slake the pressing thirst of the men long before we camped. The oven heat continued and slowly under that weight the afternoon dragged on. Toward dusk the journey ended, and our column moved into a curious narrow declivity that finished in a quarry-like space. We descended and were lost from the landscape above. There was no sign of water; but the cliffs and disheveled rocks were covered with strange drawings and writings. Then with whisperings of awe, Mohammed, one of the men who had gone in front, told me that we were in a secret place of water. "Not many know of it," he assured me. "A few of my people and robbers from Ahaggar; but not the robbers from Tibesti. You are the first white man who has seen it."

He beckoned me to go with him, and we proceeded until we came to the closed end of the defile. Then, picking a way among giant boulders up to the straight cliff base, he halted and pointed with a smile to a dark hole in the wall at the ground's edge, no larger than the den of hyena or jackal. "Ama!" he exclaimed.

The place was unusual, uncanny. "Water in there, Mohammed? How do you get it out? Go back and bring Sili with a water-skin and ask Sakari to give you a candle. I want to have a look."

When he returned, we wormed our way into the hole. Past the entrance there was a cavern where a man could stand, stooping. Crossing it, we went through a long tunnel to a further cave, lower than the first, and there, in the bowels of the earth, gleaming in the candle-light, lay a black pool of water, clean, clear and deliciously cool.

In that mysterious haven we camped beside water in abundance. Owls and bats and ghoulish shadows were our companions through the night, but the white vulture that points the places of water and human dwelling marked not the sky by day, since even from him of the outer world the secret of the cave was hidden.

I remember vividly another strange place in the Sahara where I came upon water—a well of astonishing age. It was south of Air, in country that is now desert. The well is sunk through solid rock to a depth of seventy feet. One looks down into it and speaks in a hushed voice and the dark chamber booms back a whole volume of sound. A pebble is dropped to the bottom and the splash of it sounds like surf on the seacoast. The wall of the well is seared with deep channels worn by the friction of bucket-ropes that passed up and down—for who knows how long! It seems almost impossible that they have been worn within historic times. The well offers a problem. There is no grazing-land near it, no source of food-supply that would today enable a band of men to camp there for a prolonged period while they labored (with rock-drilling implements, of which there is no record) on the tremendous task of sinking the shaft through solid rock. Natives have no knowledge of how the work was accomplished. Therefore I try to set back the hands of time and imagine the land as once covered with vegetation for herds of camels and goats and with pools of water in the low hills. And, as a dreamer, I conjure up a past, when, maybe, a tribe of nomads camped in the hollow, with everything in the neighborhood that they required for themselves and their herds, and the old chief kept his slaves employed, at a time of plenty, in drilling this well, partly as a whim and partly to be assured of water for his people in the height of long summer.

I have traveled far in the Sahara and know many wells in like places. They all suggest a by-gone age when greater fertility made it possible for the nomads to camp where they willed—sometimes in localities in which they cannot camp now. Wherefore, in this, as in many another strange way, it comes back to one that the Sahara is a decadent land.....

The people of the land depart like the creatures of the wild when the struggle for existence becomes no longer possible. Hence, in Air alone, there are scores of stone-built villages deserted and steeped in pathos, no longer harboring a single living soul. And what of Agades, which is still alive? Its dwellings are half in ruins. It supports about 2000 inhabitants and its surroundings are drear beyond description. Yet it was once a great city on a famous, ancient route across Africa and is said to have contained 50,000 inhabitants—more than the present whole population of the Sahara. How large this is, we can tell only approximately. From data collected, I believe it to be about 30,000—say 200 to 600 in an oasis here and there at wide intervals; 5000 in the Air region 5000 in the Ahaggar and 10,000 in Tibesti—roughly about one human soul to every seventy square miles.

And there is no tangible counteraction to decline. Yet on this score the question of rainfall is intensely interesting. Though the mountains of the Sahara generally attract more rain than the desert, that advantage is almost momentary; for, as soon as rain touches the bare hills, it streams down into estuaries on the desert that drink in water with thirst that knows no quenching. Nevertheless, the passing of mountain torrents leaves some moisture in the river-bank and pools in the deep-gullied stream and in a brief week green vegetation springs to life in thin lines in places and grows quickly to maturity. It is then that is the grazing supply of the year—whether browsed over then or in the longer drear months that follow, when grass and plants, in scattered tussocks, lie dry and uninviting, but are the best that the country has to offer. Should the elements ever be kind, and good and consistent rains fall for two or three years in succession, the whole land would undoubtedly revive its vegetation with astonishing speed. Perhaps such revivals have occurred in the past and may occur again. But I fear that at best they can last but a short while.

Indeed, conditions at present are opposite. I have heard from the nomads of regions having no rains for three years, four years and even seven years and I have myself seen a grass called "had" dried out and dead, though natives declare that it never dies except when there are more than four rainless years. It is obvious that rain is the greatest boon the Sahara can know. Luckily, we have been twice on the trail at the memorable time of its coming, on August 1920, and again on July 13, 1922.

BOYS and Girls

Dopshun in Search of a Mother

Chapter II

SUDDENLY Sunday-school papers became a gold mine for more pictures or Dopshun's scrap-book: children saying their prayers at their mothers' knees; children sitting primly in church in the family pew. Dopshun collected papers all over the church, and one unforgettable day she found an astonishing verse: "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." There it was in black and white! In the Bible! Surely one had to believe the Bible. But just imagine! The Lord! The Lord himself! She sat frozen in a still kind of horror at first. Little icy pricklings crept over her scalp and down her back. The Lord . . . the Lord himself . . . could it mean death? "Take me up"—what did this mean, up where? She began thinking harder than she had ever thought about all the things she had ever heard, until suddenly "up" became a marvelous word: up in his arms! For wasn't he always picking up some little child and putting him down in the midst of grown-ups, saying: "You had better become like this child if you really want to please me"? Wasn't he always taking children up in his arms and blessing them, even though his friends had tried to send them away? "Let them come to me," he said, "my heaven is going to be made up of them." Wasn't he able to find little boys with lunch-baskets and say: "Come now, let's see if we can't feed all this big crowd, you and I"? Why, the Lord was the loveliest, kindest, dearest person. She felt thrilled with the dearness of him. The frozen pricklings thawed—she was adopted! She! She! Nose and all. Straight hair and all.

She walked on air. Wanted, adopted, for "taken up" surely meant adopted. She longed to tell some one, yet telling was risky, for Keys might say: "She has such a big nose, sir." But instantly Dopshun knew that was a wrong thought, for the Lord was unchangeable, the same yesterday, today, and forever. She tucked the delicious secret deep in her heart, so that the scrap-book became less precious, while she walked on air—all spirit, she!

Then came the day of graduation from the primary to the junior department in Sunday school. Every graduate had to recite some of the required memory work.

The church was full of people. The primary children sat on the platform. One by one, self-conscious little girls stood up, swished their skirts and waded timidly through the ten commandments and the hundredth psalm. Breathless little boys stuck their fists into the pockets of their "Sunday-go-to-meeting" trousers and hacked a halting path through the beatitudes. Dopshun waited wondering what hers was to be. Then: "Magnhild Gretchen Schossel, the twenty-third psalm."

The Explorers' Club

She stood up. The church suddenly seemed to swarm with faces, all eyes! She became conscious of her long, long nose. She found herself rubbing the end of it . . . rubbing . . . rubbing.

"The twenty-third psalm," a voice reminded her, softly prompting: "The Lord is my . . ."

Dopshun looked down; then rallied instantly and recited in beautiful fashion, each word freighted with the sudden love she always felt near her nowadays:

"The Lord is my mother—I shall not want. He restoreth my soul. He prepareth a table before me in the presence of mine enemies." (She looked over at Keys, in her Sunday bonnet, with that awful pansy plastered in the middle of the front!) "He anointeth my head with oil, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord—forever!" The last word came after a slight hesitation, triumphantly.

Chapter III.

Afterward, a tall lady in a sable coat asked: "Who is that comical child who caused such a sensation? The ugly duckling who got stage struck and rubbed her poor nose?"

"She is one of the Foreign Asylum orphans. Wasn't it an odd mistake for her to make—"The Lord is my mother?"

"A mistake? I wonder!"

And the tall lady came through the gates that very afternoon to interview Keys: "You needn't tell me all this, Miss Smith, about her being a homely child, for I was a homely child, myself, and there never was a minute of any day that I was not painfully aware of it. I was always trying on red dresses, or blue dresses, or yellow dresses, to see which was most becoming. But nothing helped me, I kept right on being the homeliest, most disappointing little daughter. So I've always said that I hoped some day I could have a homely daughter myself, just to give me a chance to prove whether love can't make even homeliness charming. That's why I want Magnhild, Miss Smith. I want to watch for the first hints of love changing her dear, queer face! I want to plan little ways to make her eyes gleam, to make her face shine. Don't you think it will be real fun?"

Miss Ruby Agnes Smith thought this was all "Greek," but she said: "Well, of course, you're rich enough to do as you please, but—"

"Nonsense! Money has nothing to do with it at all. In fact, money has been the one big trouble with me. Plenty of money, but no mother. So I tried beauty specialists the whole world over, and I'm the same queer person as ever. So now I want to see what warmth and devotion and love will do!"

Miss Smith stirred uneasily: "Well, all I've got to say is, I'll call Magnhild in, so you can see her near to, for she's a very homely little girl."

Magnhild had the surprise of her life. You see, she was still thinking what a lovely mistake she had made in Sunday school, when the dear word "Mother" slipped so naturally into the twenty-third psalm. She was still walking on air, when she was brought to earth by the unexpected word "Dopshun"; by a lady all fur coat and diamond rings, with a glittering car purring at the front door.

But off she went: And Keys waved goodbye from the doorstep.

Chapter IV.

It was a wonderful house, where everything came from somewhere else, far off. "The carpets are like walking on cat's fur by mistake," beamed Dopshun, used to linoleum. "And don't you really mind my nose?" (This, every half hour or so!)

But there were disappointments, too. "Where is my father?" she asked at supper. It seemed there was no father. Dopshun nobly swallowed this pill, but at bed-time came a worse one, as she waited in vain to be asked to kneel to say her prayers. Presently she said: "Maybe it's because you're a 'mother-who's-only-a-Miss' that you don't know about prayers at your knee. But I can show you a picture in my scrap-book, then you'll know how. Isn't it lucky I brought it?"

And as she thumbed those well-loved pages something so very special began to shine in her eyes that the older woman gasped as she listened.

"You see, I've got it all figured out about the mother I want. So when I climb fences could you look at me like this mother, as if ribs didn't matter at all? And could you look like this oatmeal mother? Have you a gay rubber apron like hers? And when I pray, maybe you could kiss the tip-top of my hair as if you wanted God to know you loved me."

The tall lady looked at her ugly duckling, at the glow on that dear funny face, suddenly so beautiful.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Building, Los Angeles, Calif.; 700 Ford Building, Boston, Mass.; 2328 South Michigan Avenue, Chicago, Ill.; 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

THE HONOR ROLL FOR THREE MONTHS

The states on the following list are the ones which collected and sent in, during the first three months of the present fiscal year, more money than they turned in toward the unified budget during the same period last year. They are arranged here in the order of the percentage by which they surpassed their last year's record: New York metropolitan board, North Dakota, Missouri, Rhode Island, Delaware, Idaho, New Jersey, New York state, Nebraska, Massachusetts, Kansas, Connecticut, Colorado, Ohio, and Southern California.

Collections for the first three months of the present fiscal year show a slight increase over last year. The amount received from the states for May, June, and July, 1926, equals 108.16 per cent of the amount received during the corresponding months of 1925.

KEEPING BAPTISTS INFORMED

The Baptist church of Neponset, Ill., has voted to send the state bulletin to each family in the church and include the cost in the church budget. This is one good way to keep Baptists interested and informed of denominational work. The pastor, Rev. H. L. Alley, has entered into his new work with enthusiasm and as part of his plan for the future work of the church has arranged a special program for each month of the coming year.

HEALTH TAUGHT IN VACATION SCHOOL

Satisfactory reports are coming in from the vacation Bible schools held in Chicago and vicinity this summer. Aiken institute has reported over 1000 enrolled, as in previous years. The records show that 746 of the number were Catholics. At Immanuel church, an interesting health project was introduced. The health department of the city placed a high grade nurse in charge and the children were taught health and first aid rules and given physical examinations. They made first aid and health kits which were shown at the final exhibit on the closing night.

NOT A "PART-TIME" CHURCH

The First church of Tucson, Ariz., does not believe in "part-time" church going. Summer does not bring with it the general let down in activities and attendance which is so common in many congregations. A series of "wide awake" Sunday night sermons by the pastor, Rev. R. S. Beal, is advertised only for those who do not expect to sleep. The growth of the congregation of this church is well worth mention. Since 1918, the membership has increased from 203 to over 1000.

"BRIDGING THE CHASM"

One of the most interesting items in the recent leaflet, "What Some Rural Pastors Are Doing," which has been issued by the literature division, is the following description of community work done by the Baptist church of Rives Junction, Mich. The pastor of this church, Rev. O. B. Ansted, wrote that the members found it necessary to promote the social work in order to bridge the wide chasm which existed between the church and the community. Here is how they did it.

Over a year ago, the church purchased a four-acre lot in the center of the town for a park and recreation ground. There has since been formed a non-profit-sharing company to finance the purchase of the land and also to improve the property with children's equipment, as well as a baseball diamond and tennis courts. A committee is now at work to see what may be done regarding a community building, so that there may be a suitable place to carry on all kinds of community activities when the weather does not permit them out of doors.

For the past two summers the church has put on a good moving picture program out of doors every Saturday night, with an attendance of from 500 to 900 each night, thus uniting the whole community into one common group. The expense of the pictures was paid by the business men.

The young people's Sunday-school classes are organized and have monthly class parties with programs and directed games. The campfire girls and also some of the boys usually spend a short time camping. This last summer, several of the men took the boys of the Sunday school by auto to Michigan state college, the capitol building, the state building, the park, and other places of interest. Last winter there were eleven organizations, including the church, auxiliaries and social organizations, at work together in giving a public program nearly every week-end. This year a lecture course has been added.

THE Book of Remembrance for 1927, published annually by the Board of Missionary Cooperation as a manual of prayer and missionary information, will be ready for distribution before Nov. 1. An appealing cover design was made for this edition by Mrs. Speakman, wife of Harold Speakman, the author of "Hill-tops in Galilee," and other well known books.

A new feature of the book will be that the scriptural readings, instead of being disconnected portions of the scripture, are so arranged that they will take the reader through the entire New Testament.

The 1927 Book of Remembrance will be obtainable for twenty-five cents from the literature bureaus at 504 Columbia

Among Ourselves

Boston Letter

By CHARLES H. WATSON

The Greatest Harvard President

CHARLES W. ELIOT unquestionably was the foremost of the Harvard presidents, and perhaps the greatest educator that we have ever produced. He held so large a place among us, as a compelling influence and force, it is no exaggeration to say that his death brings upon thousands a sense of loneliness and loss. He was the sanest, most intelligent and perfectly rounded specimen of modern manhood that we possessed. He was our eldest, wisest statesman. He bore the best fruit in his old age, according to God's promise to the righteous. When he was in the nineties, confidently we all listened for his wisdom on the largest and most difficult problems. Not only were there such luminous mentality and such full and sympathetic helpfulness and in a man as were united in him. He really did he touch the deepest concerns of every toiler everywhere. When, speaking before the labor unions years ago, he preached the gospel of "joy in labor" and they greeted his message with derisive laughter, they little knew the tragic pathos of their derision. He was giving bare the great secret of a much larger, sweeter, nobler, enduring working power than any of them knew. Safely we might say that his was a threefold secret: industry, sincerity, and serenity. He helped us to the conviction that there was yet left among us an irrepressible hunger for the best in human character. And he himself trod the path that leads to such a glorious optimism.

The spirit of the departed teacher seemed to hold closely in line with his long ideals the severely simple, reverent, and truthful funeral service in the Appleton chapel at Harvard. We had no fitting voices, the first in prayer, the second in appreciation: Francis G. Peabody, and George A. Gordon. Words were few, and true: "He was the chief glory of the university," "the greatest private citizen for more than a generation of years," our "outstanding moral hero." Surely they that be wise shall shine like stars.

Ocean Park

Baptists will have to take off their hats at the summer conference and school of methods at Ocean Park on the coast of Maine. The settled excellence of its clientele and work compels it. The testimony of visitors from other summer conferences gives it the highest rank.

A few facts will explain, and account for what are really surprising results. When out of an enterprise that is supposedly emphasizing vacation frolic something edifying and worthwhile is persistently emerging, one opens his eyes. Of course the ocean is there, with its spacious majesty and its infinite variety of mood and color. And the park is there beckoning to a free and social life under the trees. But when one adds a thousand serious workers seeking better method, and reaching into fuller practical consecration in Christian service, he has something that opens his eyes wider. Just what they are there to seek, the whole plan and purpose of the school of methods aims to supply, and does supply. Of course frolic gets in; it has its times and its guidance, and all the keener zest because it relaxes after toil that all have chosen, and all respect.

Some Explaining Facts

Now for the elucidating features. The enrolment of 1014, at the school this year, was not an open basket for the names of everybody who happened within the enclosure. It was the roll of actual students who were taking the different courses, courses graded for all ages and classes of teachers and workers. A large group of ministers were instructed in courses keyed up to their trained intelligence, with some of the best instructors in New England to lead them. Also the needs and aspirations of all grades of Bible-school teachers and workers, determined and shaped the courses that supplied them. There was something about the school that reminded one of a congregation in a Roman Catholic church. It was non-exclusive, and all-embracing. There was plenty of maturity, abundance of youth, all the church and Bible-school elements in its mass. Its arms gathered in all of them for special blessing; 580 took the Bible courses, 350 the missionary courses. Every one of the 1014 was an "actual," expecting to study and get a better working equipment, and taking some of the nine courses.

In some respects, it was like a Newton

A Prayer

By W. EVERETT HENRY

GIVE us, O Lord, thy eagerness
To save lost men from sin;
To search them out and plead with them,
To love and play and read to them,
To have thy message speed to them,
To have thy work begin.

Give us, O Lord, thy willingness To suffer for the lost;
To hungry be and travel-worn,
In soulful prayer to meet the morn,
And through the day bear heat and scorn,
Nor halt at any cost.

Give us, O Lord, thy faithfulness
In winning men to thee;
Grant wisdom that our words be right,
Shed on our way thy holy light,
Clothe us with all thy gracious might,
In us thy triumph see.

summer school, so many ministers were there, and about all of its faculty were lecturers. In other respects, it was a vast organized training school of teachers and workers, bent upon the best ways to teach and work, and led by the most devoted and competent instructors in the different specialties.

The Courses and the Leaders

Here are the courses taught: Bible, missions, pedagogy, psychology, organization, method and conference, evangelism, worship, recreation. All these courses were subdivided, and each led by from two to a dozen leaders. The daily and Sunday preacher was Dr. Avery A. Shaw of New York, rightly dividing and opening up the word of truth. In addition to the Newton professors, whose names are all familiar to us, Dr. Daniel Clare, Dr. E. Leroy Dakin, Dr. A. H. Gage, Rev. Isaac Higginbotham, Rev. Miles W. Smith, Rev. A. H. Haslam, Rev. Benjamin Livingstone, Prof. Wayne Shipman, Rev. C. H. Frank, Rev. F. H. Brown, Mr. Edwin Phelps, and many others, were among the leaders.

Each day had its culmination in the general evening conference at the temple. There was a play night, a state night, a picture night with Dr. A. T. Kempton in the Holy Land, a song night, a surprise night, and a grand culminating life and work night when decisions were publicly made, special life work openly chosen, solemn dedications frankly declared, and the spiritual emphasis of the entire conference found expression. There, Dr. F. F. Peterson, the dean of the school, and animating genius in every feature of it, was at his best and happiest, and helped everybody to carry away the pleasure and the profit of the ten days so delightfully spent together. All was under the able presidency of Dr. H. A. Heath; Miss Gertrude Hartley was the inspiring and methodical registrar and "man of all work," Deacon C. B. Mitchell of Haverhill, business manager. It was a great conference, and the prospect of a still greater one in 1927 is bright. The 1014 students are now at home newly inspired for work, and armed with their fat and suggestive note books.

Some Events of the Summer

Rev. Eben F. Francis, pastor for nearly six years of the strong First church at Lynn, surprised us with his resignation, Sept. 5. He goes to Amherst, Mass., to make a home for a son who heads the department of English in the high school there. For a time, Pastor Francis will serve as minister at large, while resting after an exacting pastorate at Lynn, which had the sad accompaniment of unusual domestic affliction. In the face of it all, he was a brave, faithful, cheerful minister, sustained by the grace of God, loving his people, and much beloved by his brethren. After a befitting respite, he will have good years left in which to bless some wise church with the "best of the wine."

Fulton Heights, Medford

Baptist churches are thickening in Boston suburbs, in number, and gradually in girth. It is interesting to watch some of them grow, and win the favor of their community. Occasionally they become "community churches," wisely heading off the too frequent waste of sectarianism, yet holding sweetly to their evangelical mission, while working their field as a Baptist church. That has been done for ten years in the Fulton Heights district of Medford, with the cordial co-operation of the old mother church at Medford center, where Pastor D. J. Neily has labored so long. They began in an old club-house. Then came a comfortable "portable" building. Now a permanent church home built largely by voluntary labor, is being dedicated by solemn and jubilant services. The services began by a double wedding of four of its young members. Now may a double portion of the divine spirit continue in the services, and long after them. The young minister is Rev. John S. Franklin, and he is a live leader.

The opening meeting of the ministers was eagerly anticipated, and came on the 12th when the migratory ministerial birds had nearly all come home. The keen edge of our anticipation, aside from the always delightful element of reunion, was in the announcement that the veteran, yet vigorous, Dr. John M. English, was to address us, taking the place usually accorded to President Horr. By the way, Doctor Horr convalesces slowly, and we are not yet released from anxiety concerning him, but are hopeful. Of course our beloved "Lord John," as we fondly call him, was fully up to scale, and spoke with remarkable spiritual maturity, and with the authority of intelligent wisdom, on the real glory of Christian preaching.

Facing the Church New Year

September has come to be the "New Year" of the religious calendar. As we face it, let us not forget that dogmatism may prove a coquette luring us into too comfortable a refuge, liberalism too enticing a path into spiritual paralysis, the sadness of the nations too strong a temptation into a barren and deprecating skepticism that decoys and devours. But behold! from sea, and mountains, and intervals, comes a blessed army of teachers and pastors, returning to work in the serene peace of their libraries, laboratories, and closets, that they may promote the saving health of the people. How shall we welcome them?

Montana News and Notes

By ROBERT W. SHAW
The Annual

THE Montana Annual is just off the press and some interesting facts are revealed as the result of the year's work in this great state. In looking over the statistical tables one discovers that these churches report additions as follows: Lewistown seventy-two, with forty-one baptisms; Havre sixty-eight, with thirty-eight baptisms; Belgrade fifty, all by baptism; Billings forty-five, with seventeen baptisms; Bozeman forty-four, with eighteen baptisms. The total additions for the state as a whole were 633 with 414 baptisms. The total membership in the state is 4418.

New Pastors

Wayne A. Dalton will begin his work as pastor of the Belgrade group churches the second Sunday in September. He comes well recommended and should do a profitable work there.—O. D. Martin has come from Indiana to take up the work at Glasgow. With the return of the railroad division to that point this church should grow in strength. It is now one of the leading churches in the city and should do even better in the near future.—The churches at Dillon and Darby should have leaders soon.—Billings will call a man soon, as several good brothers are under consideration.

The Coming Year

After the summer inactivity the churches are beginning to perfect plans for the fall and winter. With the opening of the schools at Missoula, Bozeman, and Dillon, the students will give the pastors there an opportunity for work with young people. Our evangelist, W. F. Frazier, will be in the state beginning Nov. 1 and will conduct meetings in many places. Our year of evangelism will be preceded with a conference on evangelism at Billings at which the pastors of Wyoming and Montana will be present. Some pastors already have made their plans for the year of evangelism. Taking everything as a whole this year could be one of the best that Montana Baptists have had for some years.

Other Notes

A year ago the church building at Manhattan was badly damaged by the earthquake. The state convention sent Rev. J. Clutterbuck there for the month of August and as a result of his labors nearly enough money was raised to pay for the necessary repairs, to redecorate the interior, repair the furnace, and paint the exterior. The state convention contributed the salary and expenses of the worker. The community pledged the money.

Dr. and Mrs. E. R. Curry have moved to Helena, where the state office is located. This will be a helpful thing to our secretary, who is giving himself freely to the work in this state.

Montana's Needs

Montana, with many other states, needs a number of new church buildings. It could help the work greatly if some of the churches could receive substantial aid in the erection of new buildings. Just now the church at Great Falls is attempting to erect a new building, but it is a difficult task.

The state also needs a director of religious education and young people's work. The recent summer assembly demonstrated what might be done had there been a man who could give all his time to this work.

There are several openings of which Baptists could take advantage if we had men and money, especially the latter. The men can be secured, but in most cases practically all the expenses of the men must be carried for a term of years

Eli S. Reinhold

An Appreciation

BY MILTON G. EVANS

PROF. Eli S. Reinhold died in Chester, Pa., Sunday, Aug. 29, at the age of seventy-nine years.

The early years of his manhood were spent in public school work as teacher, principal and superintendent, after which he was engaged in banking for thirty-five years. In 1909 he served as president of the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association. He was a member of the board of managers of the American Sunday School Union, and charter member of the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board of the Northern Baptist Convention. In early manhood he became a member of the Fourth Baptist church, Philadelphia, under the ministry of Dr. Reuben Jeffrey. He at once identified himself with Christian work. He had been a Sunday-school teacher all his days, and at the time of his death he was teacher of a large men's class in the Upland Baptist church. He always took his Sunday-school work as seriously as his business, and spared neither time nor energy in fitting himself for the exact interpretation of the Bible. He was at home in the best literature, devotional, exegetical and historical.

As one of the most influential members of the Reading Association he felt the need of providing an opportunity for self-education for many ordained men who had not the privilege of theological training. He loved these men for their worth and for their character, and wished to help them as he had helped himself. It was this love for them and for Christian work that led him loyally to support the weak Baptist churches in the mining districts of Pennsylvania, where he had many business contacts. His experience there led him to perceive the lack of education and therefore of efficient leadership of earnest and godly pastors. They loved and respected him as he loved and honored them.

In 1907 he became the founder and first director and registrar of the extension department of Crozer Theological seminary. It was a new venture for a theological seminary to ask a layman to organize a department of instruction and outline a curriculum to meet the needs of ordained ministers. But Mr. Reinhold's years of experience in teaching the Bible and his unusual technical scholarship, gained through study at home and abroad, fitted him for his new work.

He lived to see more than 1300 students enrolled in the extension department, and had the pleasure of sending examination papers and personal letters to students in every country in the world.

The associate director, Rev. Rittenhouse Neisser, becomes director, and the work will be carried on on the lines projected by its founder.

Professor Reinhold is survived by his widow, Mrs. Louisa J. Compton Reinhold, who in her days of strength was as conscientious a Sunday-school teacher as her husband; one daughter-in-law, Mrs. Milton C. Reinhold; and one granddaughter, Miss Marie Louise Reinhold, who will continue their residence in Chester.

The funeral services were in charge of Pres. Milton G. Evans, assisted by Rev. Samuel E. Smith, pastor of the Upland Baptist church.

Robert Nelson Van Doren

An Appreciation

BY GEORGE W. TAFT

ROBERT NELSON VAN DOREN, son of Aaron and Isabelle Gruver Van Doren, was born in Fredon, N. J., Dec. 22, 1847, and died on Aug. 31, 1926. He was married to Martha Louise Howe of Cherry Valley, Ill., June 1, 1881, who survives him. Of two brothers, two sisters, and one half-brother, all save one sister are living.

Mr. Van Doren was graduated from Madison university (now Colgate) in 1875 and from Hamilton Theological seminary in 1878, taking at the same time his master's degree. In 1869 he was licensed by the First church of Newton, N. J., was ordained and shortly afterward administered his first communion on Oct. 26, 1878, at Bath-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., where he remained as pastor until 1883. He then held the following positions: Pastor First church, Oak Park, Ill., 1888; Vermillion, S. D., 1890-1897;

ELI S. REINHOLD

Port Huron, Mich., 1897-1901; associate editor of the Standard 1901-1912; superintendent of the Baptist children's home one year; associate pastor memorial church, Chicago, one and one-half years; nine months acting pastor First church, Chicago, when he became the supply and then pastor of the Washington Park church, in 1916. In a little over a year the Calvary church united with the Washington Park church, retaining the Washington Park property but taking the Calvary church name. Doctor Van Doren remained here until his sickness a few months ago.

Doctor Van Doren occupied many positions of responsibility and trust. He served on many boards and commissions in an official capacity. In recent years he has been active in connection with Baptist affairs in Chicago, acting on some of the most important committees and boards of the Chicago Baptist Executive Council, the Northern Baptist Theological seminary, and the Chicago Baptist Association.

Doctor Van Doren was a rare and winsome Christian in the highest sense of the word, and a splendid exemplification of the best type of Christian gentleman. The Lord had good material on which to work and for nearly fourscore years his life was a benediction. In poise and judgment he was almost unsurpassed. In his stand for evangelical truth he was like adamant, and yet he never allowed those who held different views to surpass him in Christian courtesy. As a husband, a kinsman, and a friend he was the incarnation of all that is best. His passing leaves a vacancy that will not be filled and yet we have the assurance that with him it is far better for he is with the Master to whom he was so devoted, whose cause he served so efficiently, and whose likeness he shared.

A Pioneer Preacher

An Appreciation

By L. R. FORD

ELTON C. DEYO was born in Wyoming, N. Y., in 1851. He attended Middlebury and LeRoy academies; later he moved with his sister, Mrs. Wheeldon, to the town of Newsted, having purchased a farm three miles from Akron, N. Y. When thirty-eight years of age, he was converted and said at once to the writer, who was preparing for the ministry, "I must go with you, for I have felt from my early boyhood that if I were ever converted I should have to preach the gospel. I am converted now and must do as God wants me to do." His friends thought that a good farmer would be spoiled to make a poor preacher. A seminary president told him that he was making a mistake and that he had better give it up but he said, "I have a call from a greater than Dr.——" He therefore spent two years in the University of Rochester, N. Y., and two years at Colgate Theological seminary, Hamilton, N. Y.

In his senior year, a woman from the missionary society spoke in the chapel on the great need of the Blanket Indians of the West. Mr. Deyo, who sat beside the writer, whispered, "That is where I must go." That night a letter went to Miss Anna Mullan, principal of one of the grammar schools of Rochester, N. Y., to whom he was engaged, stating his plan; a reply came by return mail saying that was just what she wanted to do.

After graduation they were married and went to Oklahoma, where a church and parsonage were supposed to be ready for them. Forty miles from the church they had to leave the train and drive across the country, to find, on reaching their destination, that there was no parsonage, the church was only partly completed and the key could not be found. The window was pried open, they climbed in and began life among the Comanches, having only what they had brought in two trunks, using the workbench for a table, and the floor for a bed.

Three days later two Indians came to look things over. One said to Mr. Deyo, "You Jesus?" "No," said Deyo, "Not Jesus." Then said the Indian, "You Jesus' brother?" "Yes," was Deyo's reply, "I am Jesus' brother!" This was the beginning of as fine a piece of home mission work as ever was done by any of our home missionaries.

He had to build a parsonage with his own hands; at this time there was not a white man within forty miles, except some soldiers at Fort Sill twelve miles away.

Mr. Deyo was determined from the start to work for quality rather than quantity. When he came home on his first furlough, he had only five converts and was asked by his friends, "Did you not make a mistake in going out there?" to which he always replied, "No man makes a mistake going where God wants him to go."

The Indians soon found that there was one white man, at least, who was their friend. He had come to help them in every way possible and he found that his farming experience was just what was needed to teach them how to cultivate their fertile soil and to tell them the kind of machinery they needed to buy. He became their business agent, buying for them the things they needed; he also became nurse, doctor and undertaker. The Indians had a great fear of death; they never intended to allow any one to die in his tent. If death should occur in any of their tents, they were not fit for habitation and were burned. As soon as life left the body, and in some cases perhaps a little before, the body was rolled in a blanket, thrown into a wagon and the horses run into a ravine where the body was thrown away. Mr. and Mrs. Deyo told them to bring their sick ones to the parsonage and they would care for them; they soon had all the diseases to care for, even small-pox cases were brought to them and when death came, Mr. and Mrs. Deyo made the coffins, dug the graves and gave them a Christian burial. One time when Mr. Deyo was away, his wife made the coffin and helped dig the grave.

It was the writer's privilege to be present twenty years ago at an association of the Blanket Indians. It was one of the finest experiences of his life. He found that his old friend Deyo was one of the best known and most respected citizens in that great state. He found the church had 160 members with only two sick (or delinquent) members. At that time there was a white church also of which Mr. Deyo was pastor. At the time of his death he was president of the telephone company and had been for eighteen years. He was chairman of the directors of the bank at Lawton, ten miles away. There is a Deyo mission, named after him, a Deyo church, both white and Indian, a Deyo township. Many more positions of trust and honor were held by him, all of which shows how both the red man and the white man have come to appreciate the sterling worth of a true Christian. While he is remembered by only a few in his native state of New York, his life and influence will live on in the wonderful state of Oklahoma.

When Mr. and Mrs. Deyo went there all of the Indians were living in teepees and wore buckskins and blankets, and all were pagans. Now over half the tribe are Christians, all are living in houses, all wear citizens' clothes and nothing but a Christian burial is thought of in connection with the dead.

The secret of this great life was that he was determined to use every opportunity God gave him for speaking of his Saviour, Jesus. While in college, and all through his life, it was his rule never to be with one for any length of time without giving his personal testimony for Jesus Christ.

He died Aug. 8 in the hospital at Lawton, Okla., at the age of seventy-four. A funeral service was held at his mission church, then the body was brought to Rochester, N. Y., where a second service was held, Rev. L. E. Ford, a classmate both in college and seminary, officiating. The burial was at Pittsford, N. Y., where his wife and child are buried.

(Since writing this appreciation of his long-time friend, Rev. L. R. Ford, of Salamanca, N. Y., died suddenly in the Middle West, where he was lecturing on stewardship.)

Memorial Service to Mrs. Hollingworth

By D. J. DANIEL

IN THE A. B. M. Union hall, Rangoon, a Sunday-school memorial service to the late Mrs. Hollingworth was held Aug. 1.

Prayer, Bible reading, and singing by the children of the Sunday school, were followed by addresses by Mr. F. T. Edwards and Dr. R. J. Moses from which the following is an extract:

"With feelings of gratitude we recall on this occasion the innumerable services which Mrs. Hollingworth rendered to the Sunday school in the capacity of teacher. Though her stay with us had been comparatively short, the period was rich in temporal and spiritual blessings. By her tact, sympathy, and earnestness she endeared herself to all her Bible students and we shall cherish long memory of her time with us with a feeling of pleasure and gratitude. She endeared herself so much to us that we think of her separation with deep sorrow. Her kind and loving conversation will be ever fresh in our mind. It was a delight to her to teach our Indian children about 'Christ, and Him Crucified' in season and out of season. Meekness, spirit, faith and charity were the outstanding features of her exemplary life. She richly deserves the crown of glory which she has fought a good fight in the service of our lord. This we know—only are blessed who die in the Lord. We feel thankful to God for having given us such a noble Christian life as an example, worthy of imitation. We pray to God to comfort the loving husband and children who are left behind to mourn their loss. (Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth!) Even now it is the voice of the Spirit, blessed and resting from their toils; for what they have done goes with them."

Preaching to Convicts in Esthonia

BY ADAM PODIN,
President of the Baptist Theological Seminary in Kegel, Esthonia.

THANKS be to God who has given us full religious liberty and wide open doors in Esthonia for the gospel. I have tried to do my best, using the golden opportunities proclaiming the manifesto of the King of Kings to all transgressors of his law. During the past year I have visited every town of Esthonia from east to west and from north to south, every prison, every leper asylum, and nearly every Baptist church. I have preached in many halls, theaters and other places. At the same time I have been visiting my own church with its many mission branches, representing the Esthonian Union.

Dec. 22 I was invited by the prison master of Hark, to preach the Christmas sermon to the prisoners. At the appointed time a horse and sledge were sent to take me to the prison. On arriving there I was introduced to the minister of justice, his wife, the inspector in charge of the prisons, with five high officials, who all came specially to listen to the Christmas sermon and to set at liberty several criminals before their time, owing to their good conduct, which had resulted from the gospel meetings and distribution of New Testaments. It was a blessed time: the Lord gave me grace to proclaim full liberty for the deepest sinners. I had with me New Testaments for such inmates as had not received them yet. Before the distribution I explained the value and the power of the Word of God. Turning to the minister I said: "As this book has brought so much fruit, I take the liberty to present to you the first copy." So I started the distribution beginning with the minister and ending with the lowest criminal. At the close of the meeting the minister and the inspector expressed hearty thanks for my self denial work among the prisoners. I was invited to dine with them, but I saw it would go far into midnight so I asked to be excused, as I had twelve miles to drive home.

Dec. 27 I was again invited by the prison master at Hapsal to conduct the Christmas service. There were only ninety-nine prisoners, and I decided to cheer them with tea, sugar, pepper, candy, and good tracts with New Testaments, as a friend had given me money for that purpose. Arriving there, I took with me our local Baptist choir and started my work at once. The gospel message had such an influence on my listeners, that both officials and prisoners were crying. At the close of the meeting more than thirty prisoners decided for Christ.

The same day I had two large services at the Baptist church. The Christmas and New Year season kept me busy with all the preparations to cheer the lepers, Sunday-school children and others. We sent 600 parcels from our home to refresh the down-hearted and forsaken.

Jan. 3 I opened the united week of prayer in my own church, as I had arranged to exchange the pulpits with the pastor at Pernau. Traveling the 300 kilometers to Pernau was not easy. I took charge of the prayer meetings there.

The meetings were so well attended and blessed, that we had to arrange revival meetings in one of the largest halls of Pernau, but even this was not large enough, hundreds could not find entrance.

On the morning of Jan. 10 I had a large and blessed service at the Baptist church. From 1-4 p.m. I held meetings in two prisons, accompanied by the same local Baptist choir. In those prisons again several men and women gave themselves to Jesus, promising to start a new life with the New Year. I had just time to take a cup of tea, the only meal in the day, before leaving for the train. Arriving there I found the coupe overcrowded and was shown a place in another car, where I fell asleep. When I awoke I learned, to my surprise, that there had been an accident with the very car that I had left. An axle had broken and two cars had run off the rails. Passengers had a bad shaking-up and had shivered seven hours in a temperature 29 degrees below the freezing point. But the Lord had given me quiet rest and a sound sleep.

As I look back on the work of the past year I have no words to express my thanks to God, who has been so true to me.

Christmas and the Anti-Christian Movement

By KENNETH G. HOBART

FOR several years the Christmas holidays in China have been "open season" for anti-Christian agitators. They have felt that the celebrations which focused attention upon Christ and his death required vigorous counter-activity and also gave exceptional opportunities for opposing the gospel. We missionaries had anticipated that the 1925 Yuletide would be marked by unprecedented anti-Christian activity, since the recent troubles in Shanghai, Hankow, Canton, and elsewhere had so roused the counter-attack against the foreigner and his religion. But there was an agreeable surprise in store for us of the Swatow district. Far from being an intensified demonstration this year, the anti-Christian agitation was insignificant. In Swatow a parade was arranged by the leaders of the movement; it was a relatively small affair, however, and entirely unaccompanied by violence. Labor unions were prominent in the line-up; students conspicuously failed to give it hearty support. I am told that many joined the parade only under pressure. Of one government school, only 10 per cent of the students participated; the others gave as their reason for refusing that they would not oppose their Christian principal. Though there were fourteen schools represented many other schools were entirely without representation. Soldiers and police were stationed everywhere to prevent violence and to protect Christian institutions.

In Chaowfu, hotbed of the anti-Christian movement, aside from a small fracas outside a chapel of the English Presbyterian mission—excited doubtless by anti-British as well as anti-Christian feeling—our missionary reported "all peaceful." So far as I can learn there was no trouble in Canton at all. Here in Kityang, though previously there had been some rumblings, on Christmas day there was not the least anti-Christian excitement. On the contrary, at our Christmas exercises there was the largest crowd ever, so large that many could neither see nor hear. Furthermore, at the Christmas play given by the boys' school that evening soldiers stood guard to assist and to preserve order (something which is always necessary in a Chinese audience), while a week later Cantonese soldiers actually assisted in a benefit performance for our local church kindergarten.

How can we account for this obvious change of attitude? I think the explanation is largely found in the facts presented in a proclamation, a rough translation of which I give here. The proclamation, though unsigned, is apparently put forth by some Christian members of the Kuomintang, the so-called Bolshevik party whose leader was the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen and which is now in control of Kwangtung province. The united Christian forces of Canton protested vigorously to the party leaders against the Kuomintang's tacit approval and support of the anti-Christian movement. So effective was the protest that it drew forth the orders and expressions of opinion by influential party officials which are contained in the proclamation. The translation follows:

"A Proclamation for the Attention of Anti-Christian Agitators.

"1. When Dr. Sun Yat-sen was imprisoned in the Chinese embassy (of the Manchu dynasty) in London, he was freed after a short time, and the circumstances of his regaining liberty he recorded in a letter sent to the elder of a Chinese church in Hongkong, as follows:

"I was arrested in London and imprisoned in the Chinese embassy for ten days. The officials of the embassy sought to send me, bound, at night aboard a steamer sailing for China, thus secretly taking me out of England. This had been completely arranged and they were only waiting for the day of sailing. For two days no one knew I had been arrested and I lost hope that my life would be saved. Men in such straits cry out to heaven, as in pain they cry out to their parents. In these distressing circumstances my heart was sore troubled and repentant, and I earnestly prayed to God. Six or seven days I prayed without ceasing; the more I prayed the more earnest I became. Suddenly, on the seventh day my heart was comforted and all distress and worry left me. I realized that this was the answer to my

UNIVERSITY CHURCH, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel building, Chicago, Ill.

"Good evening friends. We are pretty much rushed just now but not quite as badly as the editor of a certain paper in Iowa who put in this illuminating item recently: 'Owing to the lack of space and the rush of editing this issue, several births and deaths will be postponed until next week.' This is dreadfully disconcerting.

"The most heartening and stimulating letter received in this office for some time came the other day from J. F. Roemer, of Waukegan, Ill. It was a reply to the usual annual statement of subscription dues. In a bold fine hand across the bottom of ye letter he wrote, 'S-u-r-e. R-o-e-m-e-r.' A check for $3 enclosed was for THE BAPTIST and Missions. That letter of just one word put more pep into us than a whole sheet filled with complaints and puerile attempts to put sand into the editor's eyes. Of course, the classical form would have been: 'Sure, Mike.' Come again.

"But the pathos of another letter in the same mail wrung our hearts. It was in a nervous uncertain hand, from a western state, and contained just one short sentence: 'Stop the paper as I have no home for it to come to.' We saw the homeless old man standing there. 'Home's not merely four square walls, though with pictures hung and gilded; home is where affection dwells, filled with shrines the heart hath builded.' No doubt he 'felt like one who treads alone, some banquet hall deserted, whose lights are fled, whose garlands dead, and all but he departed.'

"Then came a smiling letter (letters can smile) from far-away sunny California: 'Have taken the BAPTIST in all its western forms since it was the Leader, published in San Francisco about thirty years ago.' Signed, Mrs. E. C. Reid, Healdsburg. And the check enclosed set the credit ahead for many moons.

"When all is said and done, Illinois gives THE BAPTIST its greatest list of supporters. S. E. Arnold, Bushnell, Ill., can speak from a wide experience. Listen: 'Enclosed find $3 to renew THE BAPTIST and Missions. I have taken THE BAPTIST since 1866, a period of 60 years. Although I am in my eighty-third year I enjoy its weekly visits and think I cannot get along without it.' Thank you, brother Arnold.

"There is a vast difference between those who can and those who can't. At the Kansas assembly at Ottawa we read this newspaper sign: 'The Kansas Daily Kan for Kansans. The Kan kans the news. Kontributors kan drop their Kan items into the Kan kan for kanning. The Kan kant kan your items unless you kan kan them in our kan which hangs on Prexy Smith's door. Never say kant for Kansans KAN.' By that time we believed it.

"And so would you. If you had seen those seven or eight hundred young, handsome, intelligent, loyal Kansans telling the world in the pep meetings with Warren Behan presiding and Guy Wimmer leading, that 'Kansans Kan,' you couldn't have had any doubt of their potential ability to deliver the goods.

"This gives us another THINK. Why not have an annual pep meeting for THE BAPTIST in your church? Get the congregation together. Bribe them, if necessary. Offer all-day suckers for the children and ice cream for the wiser. Give the young people from the assembly group full sway for leading it. Nine rahs for grandma. She'll beam. Nine rahs and a tiger for granpa. He'll loosen up. 'Zip-boom-bah' for the pastor. He needs it. 'Stand up, Mr. Victim, stand up, stand up,' for every guilty soul not taking the paper. Let forty kids shout together: 'W-E-W-A-N-T T-H-E B-A-P-T-I-S-T,' The roof will come off and the walls will fall down. But the kids won't care. They like it. Try it out.

"The office boy recites an anti-dismal:

It's not worth while, the fretting, the sighing and the woe;
Best spend your time forgetting your troubles as they go;
Best look ahead for laughter and take no time for tears—
The sunny days hereafter will make the golden years.

It's not worth while, the grieving about the chances lost;
What gain are you receiving the while you count the cost?
Forget them, oh forget them. Look on ahead and smile,
The blue days though you've met them are none of them worth while.

It's not worth while, the whining, when things are going wrong,
The mourning and repining—mix sunshine with your song;
Come shake the shades of sadness and lose the dreams of gloom,
Your heart beats time with gladness, so give it lots of room.'

"WCOY now signs off. 'Quench not the Spirit.' Act now,"

prayer and that I had been granted God's grace. But I realized that my salvation depended upon my ability to get news of my condition to my friends. But day and night three or four men constantly guarded me. Windows and doors were tightly closed and strict secrecy was maintained. There were only two servants who came in and out once or twice every day to bring me food. Earlier I had been betrayed by these men when I sought to have them take a letter to my friends; thus the embassy officials were warned and redoubled their vigilance and secrecy. Even so, if I were to make known my condition to the outside world I must still rely upon these two men.

'Having received God's grace and comfort through answered prayer, I believed that I should be able to move their hearts so that they would be willing to deliver my letter. Therefore the morrow when first they entered my room, it happened that my guards were a bit careless so that I had opportunity to talk with the servants. As I hoped they agreed to take my letter to my friends, but I had no pen or paper. However, I had a calling-card on which I had written a few words so I sent it to two of my former teachers (Englishmen). When they heard of my condition they notified the police station at the British foreign office. At first one believed the story; the police thought these teachers were crazy, but the Chinese embassy emphatically denied their report. But these two teachers secretly investigated for a day or two and personally watched the embassy lest I be removed covertly. Neither did the newspapers at first believe that I was being secretly detained; but my teachers exerted themselves to prove that their story was true and succeeded in convincing the newspapers who promptly heralded the story far and wide.

'Not only was the entire English nation greatly stirred but also Europe; the whole world were moved. Doubtless this affair was also reported in Hong Kong at the time. The people of London would not allow this injustice; the streets the crowds demanded that the Chinese embassy be torn down. An English nobleman wrote to the Chinese minister demanding my immediate release and threatening the prompt expulsion of the entire legation if it failed to comply. The frightened minister released me. During the ten or more days of my imprisonment, there was a continuous exchange of cablegrams between Peking and the embassy in London. Originally my life was in their power to punish or kill as they liked, but I looked upon me in mercy and it was my will that I should be saved, and my evil designs were frustrated. . . . My experience was like the parable of the prodigal son or the lost sheep which was rescued. It was all through the grace of God. I hope that you may grow in the Christian life. Write to me of words of counsel and encouragement.

at I may increasingly understand the principles of good government'.

"2. In the constitution of the republic of China, chapter two, article six, section two, is written: 'The houses of the people may not be unlawfully entered or searched.' Section four says: 'The right of the people to freedom of speech and the press and to freely assemble and form societies may not be abridged.' Section seven says: 'The people are free to believe whatever religion they choose.'

"3. The Kuoming tang of China, when representatives from all of China met to discuss the policies and aims of the party, adopted as article six: 'The people must be free to assemble, join societies, hold public discussions, to print and publish without censorship, to live undisturbed, to believe any religion—these rights all belong freely to the people.'

"4. Mar. 20, 1925, in Peking, every newspaper reported that at Dr. Sun Yat-sen's funeral his family prayed, and that Chung Yung-chih who represented Doctor Sun's family in thanking those who attended the funeral, said: 'The day before Doctor Sun died, he said to me, 'I am a Christian; I received God's commands and for forty years I have fought evil.' The newspapers also reported that Hsu Chien said that Doctor Sun when about to die feared that the Kuoming tang would persecute his wife because she is a Christian. Therefore he instructed his colleagues, saying: 'Do not despise my wife because she is a Christian.'

"5. Last week Wang Ching Wei at Kwang Chou, speaking before the Chinese Y. M. C. A. and to the United Church of China, said to Liu Chau En, its chairman: 'Dr. Sun Yat-sen confessed himself to be a Christian. Up to his death he never denied his faith.' Wang also said: 'Whatever one believes must be sincere and truthful. Formerly Hsu Chien (a Christian) and Ma Chu Yu often argued about religion. Hsu was a believer in religion; Ma trusted in science. But I approve of Hsu because he is honest, sincere and of noble character.'

"6. The orders of the Kwangtung administrative council, the police department, and the commander of the provincial guard state: 'Several days ago, in regard to the question of religion we decided that the people are free to believe or reject any and all religions, but there must be no compulsion or trouble-making by either side. We have notified the young men's society and the department of education to this effect. We have heard that during the Christmas season, some people are planning to parade and to agitate against Christianity, and to cause trouble at the various churches. This would constitute a disturbance of the public peace. We expect that all officials and commanders of soldiers and police will carefully and earnestly guard against any disturbance. If there should be trouble, we expect them at once to quiet it, and to restrain the agitators promptly. Therefore the police department publishes this as a warning to all men, with the seal of the commander of the provincial guard affixed.'

"7. The orders of the superintendent of education of Kwangtung province: 'Having received the orders of the administrative council I must notify the department of education in every place accordingly. The council has decided as regards religion: all men may believe it or reject it as they choose, and are free to discuss its merits and demerits. But in so doing they must not create any disturbance. Therefore, I hereby notify you to that effect, and expect all to observe these orders. But if trouble does arise, I expect it to be put down immediately by the proper authorities. These orders are to be sent to every police office and to every school in Kwangtung for their information and observance. Signed, Hsu Chung Ching and Ma Hung Huan.'

Here is cause for real encouragement and joy. In the first place the anti-Christian movement has not been an unmitigated evil, for it has aroused a lethargic church to action. Secondly, these Cantonese Christians, a despised sect, have showed real courage in calling a dominant party to time for their unconstitutional activities. Next, they are learning the technique and value of united action. Finally, here is a demonstration of the power of Christianity in China; the indigenous church is becoming a molder of public opinion, a force to be reckoned with in Chinese affairs. STEREOPTICON AT

IOWA ASSEMBLY

The following note from Secretary Mitchell of the Iowa Baptist Convention, was received by the stereopticon division of the Board of Missionary Cooperation: "I am sending this line to express to you the deep appreciation of this office for the fine work being accomplished through the use of the stereopticon. The Iowa Baptist Assembly closed Sunday night. During the eleven days of the assembly we had the use of the attractoscope. It surely gave great satisfaction. At least 162 stereopticon lectures were delivered through its use. I know of nothing that speaks more loudly and is more effective than the work of the stereopticon."

LINGUISTIC FACILITY

An audience of native-born Americans able to understand a lecture by a Chinese in his native tongue would be as much of a novelty in this country as the proverbial hen's teeth. But in China, Sir Arthur Yapp, general secretary of the British Y. M. C. A., was able to speak in English without the aid of an interpreter to all but two native audiences, he told a staff conference of National Council foreign work secretaries at Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y. "Youth is on the move in the far East," he said.

Sir Arthur complimented American Y. M. C. A. secretaries abroad on being wise enough to subordinate themselves to the good of the cause, "serving as counselors rather than directors and turning over the management of foreign associations as soon as possible to native secretaries and laymen." — Reprinted from the Baptist Observer.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for September 26

EARLY LEADERS OF ISRAEL (Review)
Devotional Reading: Psa. 105:1-8
Golden Text: Heb. 12:1-2

All the lessons of the past quarter focus upon Moses, the inimitable leader and deliverer of his people. Abraham is the outstanding leader in Genesis; Moses in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers and Deuteronomy; Joshua in the settlement of tribes in Canaan; Samuel among the early prophets; David among the kings and Isaiah among the later prophets. But for original force, creative genius and executive ability, Moses heads the line.

Moses the Man

A teacher with the historical sense will make an effort to place before his pupils the real Moses as he is reflected against the background of his own time. His study has a fascinating interest. Imagination tempered with a passion for truth will enable the teacher to describe graphically the bondage of the Israelites in Egypt and the Egypt which held them as slaves. Moses in the making is always a story of entrancing interest. The circumstances of his birth and boyhood are far more romantic than the circumstances of the birth and boyhood of that model liberator, Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln never had such a test of patriotism assailed Moses when he refused to call the son of Pharaoh's daughter a despised and wretched people. And yet Lincoln had to make his decision to He made it and accepted all its consequences even to martyrdom. The untimely attempt of Moses to defend his brother Israelite revealed the need for mature judgment and seasoned experience. Forty years in the region of Hor gave Moses the poise and power necessary to lead his people out of bondage and at the same time ripened his people for deliverance from Egypt. Moses the man was always greater than Moses the manager. Personality must always stand above position. There is nothing tragic as a small man in a big place.

Moses the Manager

What a tremendous manager Moses was! It was only when duties became too numerous and varied that he could be prevailed upon to share his responsibility. Moses had to manage Pharaoh first of all in securing his consent to liberate the Israelites from Goshen. Then alone took statesmanship and sustained effort. The plagues and the destruction that left so many dead on the night of the Passover helped Moses to prevail upon Pharaoh to let his people go. Nonetheless the ability of Moses as manager apart from miracles was quite pronounced. The way in which he led an unorganized mass of slaves across the Red sea, provided for them in the desert and shaped them into unity and order reads like a fairy tale. But the best part of it is that Moses was in league with the Infinite. Without that connection the story of Moses could never have been written.

New Books

Islem Women, by Dr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Zwemer, Cairo, Egypt. West Medford, Mass.: Central Committee on the United Study of Foreign Missions.

The adult foreign mission study book of this year. It is an intimate review of religious and social conditions of Islem women throughout the world, of what is being done for them through Christian missions. It breathes tragedy and the aspirations of Islam's greatest sufferers, its women. The photographic illustrations add much to its value.

—ELMER KIRKPATRICK.

Speaker's Bible: The Epistle of James, by James Hastings, Chicago: W. P. Blessing Co. $4 per vol.

This is another volume treating upon books of the Bible, compiled from notes and writings of great ministers and authors. This last volume takes up study of the Epistle of James. A careful analysis of the letter is given followed by a great amount of sermon material and illustrations related to the reading texts. The aim is to assist the public speaker or teacher in gathering material but the author does not attempt to arrange the material in any logical form. This volume is especially desirable since it contains the index to the other volumes which have so far appeared.

—C. R. OSBORN.

A love story of entrancing interest. Ross Armitage, a young man of wealth, is in love with Cynthia Ayres who is running away from her farm home and a cruel father, when on the train the two meet for the first time. Cynthia becomes stenographer in the city and in her spare time greedily devours the education denied her on the farm. She has the gift of writing verses of real merit. Through a short poem published in a magazine, Ross discovers her after the war which took him to France. The chance meeting on the train is renewed after the usual vicissitudes of fiction. The affairs of Ross and Cynthia marry. The story is in Mrs. Smith's best vein and takes its place alongside the "Pollyanna" books which have made the author famous.

—JOHN A. EARL.

Christian Optimist, by Rev. James Coleville, M. A. New York: Doran. $1.25. Another volume in the well-composed "Little Books on the Christian Life" is by Rev. James Coleville whose English, though not so elegant as that of his fellow-Britisher, Doctor Hutton, is nevertheless more direct and forceful. In twenty brief sections too limited to be called chapters he covers "The Belief of the Christian Optimist," "The Triumph of the Christian Optimist," and "The Service of the Christian Optimist." In each section a problem of the Christian life is developed with strategy and its solution is concisely presented. Quotations in verse and prose mark a mind well-caparisoned with goodly thoughts well-spoken.

—GEORGE EMERSON HAYNES.

Young People's Projects, by Erwin L. Shaver. The University of Chicago Press. Fifty cents each.

In order to challenge the highest Christian ideals as well as to capture the deepest interest of young people of later high school and early college age, six suggested plans of projects for young people's groups have been arranged under the titles: "A Christian's Life Work," "A Christian's Recreation," "A Christian's Attitude Toward the Press," "Christian World-Builders," "Christian Young People and World-Friendships," "Young People and the Church." Each project is separately bound and contains general suggestions as to organization, duties of committees, programs, and specific group activities. Source materials are given but the emphasis is laid upon inducing the members of the group to think for themselves and to ferret out just what constitutes a Christian attitude toward these subjects. In each program are blank pages for the recording of other relevant material, outlines, programs, committee reports, decisions, etc. Each project is planned for a period of three months with meetings each week. These programs capitalize the spirit of adventure, call forth the best energy of the young people, help them to find themselves, and send them out to create a better world.

—F. H. FAHRINGER.

The Unguarded Gate, by Floyd W. Lambertson. New York: The Abingdon Press. $1.25.

A collection of sermons for children covering the school year, culminating on Decision day. Especially adapted to boys and girls of eleven and twelve years of age. In the preface to his book Mr. Lambertson notes the characteristics of the eleven- and twelve-year-old children, and the material that follows takes into consideration the psychology of later childhood. It is a sound piece of work and will prove rewarding to the pastor who desires to reach the maximum number of his boys and girls for Christ.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

news report states that in the fight in China the Cantonese troops are Kuominchun. The report is reproduced here for the benefit of those readers who may appreciate it.

The Living Church reports that on Christmas day in Isfahan, the bishop invited 450 men on their side of the main which runs down the middle of the church. On the women's side the church was even greater. An overflow service held 300 to 400 more and the men had to be closed for lack of room. In a city where a few years ago no Christian was allowed to live, let alone preach the gospel.

Baptists are reported in the Baptist Mexican to have fled in terror from Cuatuto, Guanajuato, Mex., during recent anti-Baptist rioting in which one woman, Mrs. G. C. de Cuevas, is said to have been tortured until she died; a two-month-old baby soaked with coal oil, preparatory to being thrown into a fire; houses and churches of Baptists ransacked. Those who attacked the Baptists reported indignant because the church was allowed to continue services, while the Catholic churches were closed as a result of the new religious law.

Mr. Lloyd George will be picturesque as the sod covers him. At the recent meeting of the Welsh Baptist Union at Anglesey, Anglesey, he said of the minister of the remembered John Elias O'Fon: "It was not a foghorn in the mist, but a living light in the darkness. His path was clear to him, and he made it clear to who heard him. That was one of the essentials of true oratory. He had it in a marked degree, but combined with this sound judgment. It has been said that a combination of these gifts is out of place in the pulpit, but such a statement is a Magna Charta of stupidity."

The inter-board commission on student religious activity, Memphis, Frank H. Bell, secretary, announces two important dates. Oct. 3 is Student Church-unionship day. All students at colleges asked to relate themselves definitely to the local church where the school is held. Literature, including a wall chart, will be sent to all schools and to pastors where schools are located. Oct. 28-30 is the date of the first All-Southern Baptist Student Conference at Birmingham, Ala. Two thousand students are expected. Some of the nation's best speakers will be there. Pastors of some churches of students are being asked to assist their own to get there. The key-note of the conference is "The Master of my generation."

Heroin can no longer be manufactured or otherwise introduced into the United States for use as a drug. And the Inter-parliamentary Union Conference at Geneva has adopted a recommendation that such prohibition be enacted by all governments.

German Baptists of the three prairie provinces of Canada held their annual conference this year at Freudental, Alberta. The occasion was one of happy reunion. A new church organization was reported from Regina. Nearly $6000 was contributed during the sessions for various denominational causes. The next meeting will be held at Winnipeg.

"Certainly we shall not be good lovers and interpreters of the Bible unless we begin with the understanding that all truth is true and in harmony with all other truth," states Prof. W. O. Carver. "The human mind is as capable of misunderstanding statements in the Bible as of misreading facts in nature, and as capable of overlooking statements in the one as indications in the other. It is as important that we correct our interpretation of scripture by established facts of nature as that we correct our understanding of nature by the teachings of scripture. God speaks to us in both. . . . It is the same God revealed and revealing in both. . . . It is therefore as much of a test of love of truth and of God for us to be ready to correct our understanding of the Bible by our knowledge of nature as to revise our reading of nature by the clear word of the Bible."

In Cuba there is a large tract of land whose surface is bare rock, and yet it is covered with a fine growth of timber. The trees start their growth in crevices, where they find little pockets of decomposed leaves and detritus of rock. The roots stray over the surface of the stone until they find deeper pits in the coral formation into which they dive to find sustenance at the bottom.

Whether Romanism or Protestantism is responsible for the rise of capitalism is the subject of a long and interesting discussion in the Baptist and Reflector. It notes a recent effort of Hillaire Belloc to throw upon Protestantism the responsibility for "the enslavement of the masses by the plutocracy," as well as a formal reply to the charge from Wilfred Monod. And it reaches the conclusion that "if capitalism had been concerned in the Reformation, it would have taken the side of Romanism." The rise of the question is itself a curious phenomenon. Who could have imagined a few years ago distinguished representatives of Protestantism and of Romanism disavowing for their respective communions the historical and moral responsibility for capitalism?

Two common arguments about the duty of tithing are clipped from an editorial on stewardship. The first states that "the regular setting apart of the tenth of their income by southern Baptists would settle all our financial difficulties and take care of every enterprise of our beloved denomination, whether it be the welfare of the local church, work within the state, in the South, or world-wide enterprise." If the money thus set apart should be devoted to the denominational enterprises, the statement as a financial proposition would be true so far as present and visible needs are concerned. But the second statement opens a big question. It follows: "Personal liberty attends the giving of money which has been assembled according to the rule and law of God. A man may use his conscience and his best wisdom as to the meritorious object on which he bestows God's money, and using his conscience, can feed his soul as he cannot feed it by anything else he does. He may give God's money or not to this or that cause, giving it according to the enlightenment of his conscience." But the setting apart of the tenth on the basis of personal liberty of appropriation, would leave the financing of denominational enterprises still up in the air. To depend for the support of those enterprises upon tithing, they must have some way of making sure that they will get the tithe. Is it quite correct to say that God prescribes the tithe but does not tell what to do with it?

The International Federation of League of Nations Societies held its tenth congress in July at Aberystwyth, Wales, with 200 delegates from thirty nations, eight of them from America. The congress emphasized the outlawry of aggressive war, simultaneous disarmament, security and arbitration.

All Protestant foreign fields have some 30,000 missionaries. The number has almost doubled since 1900. They go out from 139 societies. Many are physicians and nurses, a form of service which is steadily growing. Many are teachers, for on Protestant fields today no fewer than 2,500,000 children are under Christian training. The United States leads all the rest of the world in amount of money sent to these foreign fields. The sum has now reached $47,000,000 a year, and steadily increases.

Every day's dispatches make it clearer that in China the issue is gradually forming in terms of world war between the organized capitalism of western nations and the more or less disorganized communism of Russia and China. The hand of Russia is manifest; that of the allied empires, particularly those of Great Britain, Japan and the United States, more concealed, but none the less active. News reports designate the parties in the conflict broadly and habitually as the communists and the allies. Thus far the attitude of the United States government seems to have been guarded and correct, but the pressure for intervention is strong and insistent. There is a volcano in China and the world is standing on the crater's brink.

In reply to a question of a reader, the Northwestern Christian Advocate gives this careful statement of its reason for being "an out-and-out on war": "By any test whatever, the theory and practice of modern war are frankly opposed to the spirit of Jesus Christ, and openly deny his teachings. . . . Since, in our opinion, civilization cannot possibly survive a 'next great war,' naturally we do not see any particular wisdom in spending money and life on an enterprise which is bound to end in the general breakdown of human society. . . . Another of our reasons against war grows out of our interest in seeing pure Christianity become the one acknowledged and accepted redemptive and social force among men. We believe it is better fitted to play that part in human affairs than any other religion or philosophy whatever. But the first sign of the collapse of civilization, after a future great war, would be the extinction of Christianity, or its prostitution by the world's new rulers as one of their most convenient tools. Holding our conviction about war in these three forms, it seems to us that the present business of every thoughtful human being, apart from the negligible few who really wish to make the world a desert, is not to think how any nation can best be prepared for the next war, but how every nation can by every means prepare to prevent it."

Snears at the Rotarian and the Kiwanian are something in the fashion among cynics, but read the aims of the Kiwanis club of Lewistown, Mont., as displayed on one of its banners: "To give primacy to the human and spiritual rather than to the material values of life; to encourage the daily living of the golden rule in all human relationships; to promote the adoption and application of higher social, professional and business standards; to develop by precept and example a more intelligent, aggressive and serviceable citizenship; to provide a practical means for forming enduring friendships, rendering altruistic service, and building better communities; to cooperate in creating and maintaining that sound public opinion and high idealism which make possible the increase of righteousness, justice and good-will."

Germany's entrance into the League of Nations is a long step in the direction of international understanding and peace. Particularly it is a step toward the formation of the United States of Europe. Until the peoples of Europe shall have achieved such an organization, the United States of America will probably hold aloof from the League of Nations. When they shall have achieved it, American co-operation with them will carry less of the seeming danger of "entanglement." Meanwhile, every such gain strengthens the pro-league movement in this country.

Disciples or Dogmatists?

THE Great Commission is accepted as valid for the whole evangelistic program and it seems to be so. It is, throughout, a teaching program with baptism sandwiched into it at the point where the status of discipleship becomes manifest, and accompanied by the promise of the continuing presence of the living Christ with his followers in carrying out that program. The thing is so simple and so dignified that one can easily mistake it and one can hardly wish to commit one's life to a nobler task. And yet in actually undertaking to carry it out we get some curious results. We get a lot of church members who seem never to have found out what it means to be a disciple of Jesus. We get militant denominationalism and militant factions within denominations. We get schemes of opinion and imperative programs that run in seemingly irreconcilable antagonism to one another. And all the while we plead the Great Commission and the favoring presence of our Lord to sanctify such an odd assortment of results. Is it clear that Jesus had such results in view when the commission was given? If so, let us seriously so ascertain and understand. If not, the results challenge the methods we pursue in getting them, and call for elementary reconsideration.

For instance, a disciple is a learner, with the presumption that he is also a follower of his teacher in respect to what is taught. This raises a question concerning the Great Commission which is silent. Is the task of the evangelist to make disciples to himself or to Jesus? Do the apparent alternatives mean the same thing? If they differ but have some sort of connection with one another, which is the prime thing? The problem is not a trifling one. It involves the whole meaning of discipleship. Do those who hear the evangelist accept his word and follow his leadership as final, or does his message issue in their becoming intelligent and free thinkers after the mind of Jesus and does his ministry make them loyal to the immediate personal leadership of Jesus? The Roman Catholic church has no difficulty in this question; it frankly calls people primarily to follow its teaching and to follow its priesthood. Does Baptist evangelism pursue the same program? If not, just how far does ours differ from theirs in this particular?

Assuming that the Baptist evangelist stands at the opposite pole from the Roman Catholic evangelist, and that his first objective is to bring his hearers under the immediate spiritual and personal leadership of Jesus, he comes upon a vital question of method. Shall he announce his own theological conceptions as being the truth of Christ and insist on their acceptance as a standard of orthodoxy? Or shall he strive to awaken his converts to free inquiry on their own initiative and leave them to form their own free conclusions upon Christian truth from the sources of information available to them? Here again, Rome has no embarrassment. She frankly pursues the dogmatic method. She sets definite limits to the process of inquiry on the part of her disciples. She tells them what to think and expects them to accept her didactic statements. Does Baptist evangelism use the same method? If not, wherein, specifically, does the difference appear?

This question is not a mere whimsical invention. It grows out of an observed fact, namely, the tendency of an evangelist of a particular theological type to produce a body of converts who accept his theology as their own, and if he is militant, follow even his example of militancy in the assertion of that theology. The type of theology involved in the case seems to have no significance. The result may be as apparent in the case of one theological type as another. It seems to be a matter wholly of evangelistic method. But if the trail of an evangelist is marked by a line of converts who consistently reflect his theological mold even to its oddities and its pet intolerances, can there be any doubt as to the method of his teaching? Yet it is not unusual for an evangelist to advertise not only that he is himself orthodox according to some particular standard, but that he is sure fire in producing converts of the same brand of orthodoxy.

True Christian discipleship is docile to the mind of Christ. To ascertain his mind is its constant quest. It accepts nothing in his name that does not bear in some form the stamp of authenticity as his truth. It resolutely seeks available sources of information concerning him. It refuses ecclesiastically mediated meanings. If any light is to be found in a church's creed or a preacher's opinions, very well, but for a real disciple inquiry cannot stop there. And no evangelist has done his work thoroughly who has not left behind him a group of converts who are bent on finding out for themselves all that they can find out of the mind of Christ, even though such inquiry should call into question the evangelist's own teaching. The Berean example is still valid.

What this means in practice is the discipleship of research rather than of transmitted opinion. The convert who sets out in quest of his own discovery of Christian truth will make the asking of questions his intellectual instrument. Where he finds partisans disputing he will seek information. Suppose, for instance, that he should release the power of his mind to ask for light on some of the questions of evangelical religion. Is God a Person? What is meant by three persons in the Trinity? When, where and how did the scriptures by parts and as a whole originate? What part did God have in producing them? What is a miracle? Of what use is it? What part had God in causing the death of Jesus? Is there a future life? Am I saved? How do I know whether or not I am saved?

The convert who has acquired the habit of covering the field of doctrine with his own inquiries and of developing his own answers is far more likely to prove a real disciple of Jesus than is one who accepts, and perhaps becomes a factious contender for, ready-made theological opinions and party slogans. One of the best ways to relieve the Baptist denomination of doctrinal controversy would be to turn into its membership half a million converts set on finding for themselves the mind of Christ on points at issue.

Baptists, of all peoples, ought to be ready to trust the results of such evangelism. Baptists profess to have a profound faith in the religious competency of the common disciple and in the power of the Bible to yield its truth to the common seeker. We believe that in the hands of a sincere and intelligent seeker after God the New Testament is a safe and sufficient guide. Can we not afford to make this the guiding principle of our evangelistic program?

Preaching to the Men of Today

IN the April number of the Christian Union Quarterly the leading article is by Samuel McComb, professor of pastoral theology in the Episcopal Theological seminary, Cambridge, Mass. In the introduction the author deals trenchantly with the weakness and the power of the pulpit. The weakness of the pulpit reveals itself in "uncertainty on the part of the preacher as to whether he has any definite and living word which he can afford to utter with absolute confidence." This uncertainty is the result of failure to grasp the primary and fundamental truths of the Christian religion. But wherever the power of the pulpit is most pronounced, Christ is preached as the "creative revelation of power, peace and forgiveness."

Five things, according to Doctor McComb, should mark all gospel preaching to the men of today. Great constructive ideas should dominate modern preaching.

Religion is either everything or it is nothing. Ultimate reality is the irrepressible quest of all honest souls who seek for truth as the prospector seeks for gold. Tradition has its value, but it is not ultimate. Ecclesiastical authority grew out of something farther back, and something farther back is the truth which the seeking soul must discover. Therefore the preacher must base his message on genuine historical foundations and vindicate his faith by the facts. The ethical and intellectual grandeur of the Christian religion should capture the preacher and he in turn should generate enthusiasm among his hearers by the majestic splendor of massive ideas. The dogmatism of the past has no voice in the modern pulpit, but something better may take its place, namely, conviction based upon the living realities of Christian experience.

Constructive ideas in preaching should be augmented by suggestion. By this Doctor McComb means suggestion as to the best method of making the preaching practically effective. What practice is to the piano player the technique of religion must be to the people who hear the preacher exhorts to the achievement of good things. Principle should find its demonstration in practice. Many people say, "If only I knew how." They know that pressure on an electric button brings light, that the turn of a faucet releases water, and that driving a motor car is largely a matter of practice; but spiritual forces seem to be more evasive and less subject to control. Therefore preaching to men of today must point out clearly how life obtains in the spiritual as well as in the material realm.

Taking for granted the note of triumphant gladness which ought to give tone to all modern preaching, we pass on to emphasize the fourth point in the article, namely, democratic sympathy and outlook. "The end and aim of religion is nothing less than a redeemed society in a redeemed body, dwelling in a redeemed environment." This does not mean that the preacher is to act as an economic expert or to give a large part of his time to so-called socialistic theories. He must speak to men as men without committing himself to any specific doctrine which claims to be a panacea for all the ills of society. The wage-earner must be told repeatedly that all material advancement is dust and ashes without the passion of faith that constrains men to develop the highest loyalty and service; and the rich man must be warned against selling his soul for financial gain. In this the preacher, himself an example of simple living, will encourage the free discussion of the democratic ideas he commends from his pulpit.

The final point in this excellent article deals with the form of the sermon. Doctor McComb insists that modern preachers must recover the lost art of sermon making. He holds that this art is the most difficult because of the singular scarceness of those who excel in it. The sermon should combine the two elements of architecture, utility and beauty. "To avoid all manner of mannerism, tediousness, slipshod and negligent speech, sounding but empty phrases, lame and impotent conclusions is a work to be achieved only by a devoted and painstaking artist. Other things being equal, that sermon will best serve its purpose, and evoke a deep response from him who hears it, which is organic, proportioned in structure, impressive by its form and diction, noble and dignified in its ornate harmony."

The World in Transit

BY THE ASSISTANT EDITOR

The Common Law of Community Life

For this fine doctrine we are able to quote an authority no less respectable than the National City Bank of New York in a release for publication: "The common law of community life is that everybody shall be self-supporting, adjusting himself to economic conditions as they may be from time to time. Nobody has the right to say that he will not conform to economic conditions from which the entire community is suffering, or to follow a course which aggravates those conditions, while deliberately leaving to others the task of safeguarding his own dependents from the effects." The reference is directed to the striking British miners. They may answer for themselves. We are interested not in a case but in the principle. Who will deny the truth of the statement? But what havoc it would make if generally applied—for instance, if applied to the case of those corporations that disposed of the war profits by declaring stock dividends to escape the income tax! Commit it to memory. It will be useful for future reference.

Toward the Polls with Boneheads, Elect Boneheads to Office

Prof. A. R. Hatton of Western Reserve university, speaking to a group of graduates, is reported to have said, "A smaller percentage of the brightest intellects in the country are in the state legislatures and in congress now than were 100 years ago." After showing the sinister meaning of such a comparison for the country, he recommended the unanimous discharge of the duty of voting. The exhortation is becoming a futile commonplace. Look at the facts. What is actually happening is that highly capitalized business organized for profit is able to outbid the nation for the service of its clients. The remedy is not merely in voting but in understanding. Either public salaries must be vastly increased to the standard of those in business or the nation must find a cure for its money madness in business. Public salaries must go up or private ones come down. When the nation's highest talents for public service are for sale to the highest bidder, so is the nation. No number of votes at the polls can change that fact.

Churches Are Learning Their Social Message

Walter Rauschenbusch died with a broken heart. Samuel Batten passed away fearing that his prophetic social message of Christianity would follow him to the grave. Would that they might see, if they do not see, the messages and tidings that come from all parts of the field of the Northern Baptist Convention. It is clear that the pulpits of our churches were never so clearly conscious of the social implications and goals of the gospel as now, and never so clear and persevering as now in insisting upon the social practice of the principles of Christianity. The Labor day programs of the churches reveal a growing understanding and purpose. The plea of THE BAPTIST that our evangelism envisage the redemption of the world as well as the individual soul is meeting with enthusiastic response from its readers. Militarism, imperialism and pagan methods in business are beginning to wince under the scrutiny of the churches and to call preachers by hard names. The time seems to be near when the Christian forces will begin to bear upon the world their united moral impact in the interest of a truly fraternal, democratic and cooperative community life as directly and irresistibly as they did for the abolition of the saloon. These are cheering days in which to live.

Where Is the Harm in Foreign Loans and Investments?

A great international guessing match is in progress. The object is to forecast the effect, both economic and political, of American credit holdings on the resources and industry of foreign countries. Maybe those countries will be able to redeem themselves from present and future economic domination by Americans. Maybe they will be disposed to do so cheerfully. Maybe they cannot and will not. Maybe they will come to interpret their position as one of economic slavery and will adopt a policy of wholesale repudiation. Maybe the United States will adopt the policy of enforcing by its military power the claims of both its government and its citizens against foreign peoples. Maybe the sum of such claims will keep mounting up through enlarging loans and investments, as in the recent past, at the rate of one billion dollars a year. Maybe foreigners will conclude that the only way to secure release from American domination is to resort to force. Such are the hazards and the guesses. Who knows what guess is correct? Nobody. Yet in the face of such a contingency, America drives ahead with its eyes shut. The danger lies in such a momentous movement with so little sense of direction and with such tragic possibilities.

America's Choice Between Rubber and Liberty Is Made

According to the Commonweal, "Col. Carmi L. Thompson has been the official pioneer in a new voyage of conquest dear to the hearts of numerous agents and sub-agents who approach the (Philippine) islands on a wily campaign for rubber." It thinks that the only real question involved in current discussion of those islands is whether we are ready to cancel "a Philippine policy of long standing and of an anti-imperialist character, in order that the reign of rubber may be established," whether the United States is prepared to say that, "regardless of political philosophies and previous commitments, of possible dissatisfaction and strife, imperialism is an excellent thing." The interpretation is a trifle belated. Events have settled that issue. The Thompson mission is an incident in a program already far advanced. No man who stands for liberty against rubber can be elected president. Test the people, and see.

Suppose that Everybody Should Decide to Collect

Repeated reference has been in these columns to the almost incredible extent to which people buy on credit. Roger Babson, surveying the situation, remarks, not casually: "While we admit that prospects for business during the rest of the year are good, we must constantly bear in mind that such credit inflation as is now going on must end in a crisis." It is admitted that at no previous time in the history of the nation has the condition of debt been so general. The world is not going back to the old spot cash system. Credit is an instrument of exchange which has become indispensable. But there are difficulties and dangers involved. The world has not yet learned how to organize credit on a practical and safe plan, and the credit of the nation is privately controlled and used largely as a gambler's device.

Will Christianity "Work" Today?

A new vision is dawning upon the minds of millions of people

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

THOUSANDS of persons who are persuaded that Christianity has a real gospel to preach to the world are by no means sure that its gospel will "work" in the modern world. I have a letter before me in which the writer, a shrewd man, says: "I admit frankly that the gospel has proved effective in the lives of vast numbers of individuals spiritually and, to a certain extent, socially, but is it not obvious that Christianity has not been effective in the world as a whole, not even in that part of it we call Christendom? It has not changed society. It has not prevented war. Was the Holy Roman empire a great success, either religiously or socially? I express the feeling common to most men of my acquaintance when I say that while I regard the 'gospel'—as you term it—as academically sound and beautifully ideal, it cannot operate with anything like complete success in the world as we know it at present. You may say this is due in great part to the pointblank refusal of mankind to live according to its rule. That I admit. But, then, can we live according to its rule? Is it possible, under modern conditions, to live that care-free life sketched by Christ and to proceed upon the conviction that if we seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness other things will be 'added unto us'?" This letter, which has the merit of frankness, expresses what large numbers of people in our time feel.

The intellectual difficulties concerning Christianity are not nearly so acute as the practical difficulties of the gospel in its social application. When everything is reduced to its simplest form, the real antagonism to the gospel centers itself in a scepticism as to the practicability of our Lord's word, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and these things shall be added to you." Men frankly do not believe this. They think that the life of simplicity as set forth by Jesus may work very well in primitive communities, but it cannot work in a complex life like our own.

Secular Method of Living Disastrous

One thing is certain: the result of the "secular" method of living has been disastrous. Life has become an unholy scramble in which not always the best, but the strongest, the most pushful, and the least scrupulous, have "survived." The law of the jungle has become the law of human life. The things that Christ promised should be "added" have become the first things for the majority of people. Food and clothing and shelter are necessities of human life, but they have entirely filled the foreground of man's ambition, until a larder, a wardrobe, and a mansion—always growing—have come to be the summum bonum of existence. For multitudes the main purpose of life is to obtain the best food, the best clothing, and the best shelter, and the most of the best. But as all available food, clothing, and shelter are not of the best—inferior qualities being almost necessary—the race begins as to who shall obtain the best. It is striking to observe the emphasis which Jesus places upon covetousness as a mother sin. He declared that this vice was responsible for the choking of the best things in life; that it was wholly illusive, and that it led directly to most of the world's social evils.

And the world today knows that he is right. The old way of living has broken down. Say what we will about the part that bad politics played in forcing that great war upon the world, the real cause of that war was covetousness. Men were after larders and markets and wardrobes and luxuries. There would have been no European war but for the tragic fact that second things had become first things. The bolshevists and Marxians, in their bovine way, are well aware of this, hence they cry out for the destruction of the system which has brought such misery upon the world. Men who are neither bolshevists nor Marxians are just as certain that the world has been on the wrong track and they also are seeking a new method of living, although it is not the method of destruction. As for the wreckage of the modern world the most hopeful sign we perceive is the awakening of so many minds to the real cause of our trouble: that we have turned from the way of Christ as being impossible. We have trodden the contrary way, which has ended in tragedy.

The Guarantee of Jesus

But is Christ's way of life practicable? Where are the guarantees that if men live according to this way and seek the kingdom first, the rest will be re- "added": that all the needs of life will be met, and more? The only guarantee Jesus gives is the character of God. He rests everything upon that. The Father, he tells us, is the source of all good. We have to depend upon him for all we receive. He it is who supplies all our raw material, without which we could make nothing at all. Whether we own or disown him, we are his pensioners. But he never betrays us. He clothes flowers of the field and feeds the birds; he then, could he betray his own children? He would not for us by means of laws. Obey those laws and all things shall be well. "Seek first the kingdom of God and all things shall be added." That is the sole guarantee Jesus gives on behalf of a normal and happy social state. But the modern world does not believe in a good enough. It seems to be insubstantial, nebulous, unreal. It lacks the element of "cash down," that substantial guarantee which the war and the income tax have done so much to lessen. It introduces that vain thing—as men believe it to be—faith. At the bottom, therefore, the whole matter resolves itself into one question: Do we really believe in God sufficiently to entrust our future upon the stability of his character?

When we have exhausted all our logic we are compelled to return to that simple and fundamental question and answer it. Thousands of simple souls do believe in God in this way. They live on Christ's love and they abide in peace. They are never betrayed. Every minister knows widows and others who are without resources save in the love and care of God. They are happy, trustful people, who do their best and leave the rest with God, and who in all their thoughts seek the kingdom of God first. And the other things are always "added." To some extent the old miracle of the unemptied barrel and the undrained cruse of oil is continued in their experience. How the provision is made is somewhat of a mystery, but ask people of the order whether it be not true that their faith has no een betrayed! The community, however, does not believe in God in this simple way. Human life is not organized on Christ's lines, hence it is not at peace. It has taken another way, with the fatal results that are apparent to all.

If we ask, then, whether the gospel will "work" in the modern world, the answer is: Certainly, if men will give it an opportunity; but so long as they place the emphasis on the wrong things and put second things in the first place it cannot work, and its beneficent program is bound to remain unfulfilled so far as society is concerned. For the gospel does not work magically; it can work only morally. The life principle it conveys becomes fruitful only in a congenial soil. If we ask why men hesitate to receive it and live by it, the answer will be that they are afraid. Fear is at the bottom of most of our social troubles. Nations arm against each other because of fear. Men hurry to be rich because of fear. The whole system of grab which urges men to get as much of the world's goods as they can and as soon as they can is based upon fear, fear that if they fail there will be nothing left for them at the end. And Christ presses the contrary of all that. He urges the child's trust and condemns the beast's leap. Trust God, he says. Live according to his law. Put his kingdom first. Reduce all life to a single service. Refuse to be torn between mammon and God. Do this and all the parts of life, personal and social, will fall into place. Society will then be organized on the lines of a Father's kingdom and not on the lines of an African jungle. That agey, fear, will vanish in the broad light of divinely paternal love. Inequalities will remain, but all will be happy, since in the kingdom of the Father there can be no room for tyrannies, trickeries, and wars.

A counsel of perfection, people reply with a shrug of the shoulder. But is it? We have had the counsel of destruction; what is there left for us but to try Christ's way or return, like very fools, to the blasted path upon which our feet have been burned? It is a counsel of perfection, if you like, to this extent: it can never completely operate socially until the world accepts it. We are cynically reminded that we "cannot change human nature." Is that so certain? It has been changed a good deal since the beginning, and all the change for good has been in the direction of Christ. The beast is dying and the child is emerging. Miraculous changes have occurred in individuals. Lives, tigerish and hurtful, have under Christ been transformed completely. And what is possible for the individual is possible for the race.

One thing is certain: a new vision is dawning upon the minds of millions of people of a new society which answers completely to our Lord's conception of the kingdom of God. The church has an unparalleled opportunity of proclaiming anew its gospel in all its completeness, and of pressing home upon men this new point that the complete acceptance of the gospel carries with it the establishment of that social order of which the best people are dreaming, while its rejection is not only a refusal to accept a spiritual boon, but a definite and deliberate wound inflicted upon society, since it hinders the only means of true progress. There has never been such an occasion for a grand appeal on behalf of Christ as today. But to give it effect the men who make it must themselves live simply and make it clear that in their own lives the kingdom comes first. These are the adventurers for God, and in due time they will win through.

Into Italy by the Back Door

BY WINFRED ERNEST GARRISON

ITALY HAS several front entrances. One who comes in by the Bay of Naples cannot but feel that he is entering where guests are expected. Brindisi, on the heel of the boot, is a sort of postern gate for those who approach from the east. The great railroad routes from the north, piercing the Alps by the famous tunnels, the St. Gotthard, the Simplon, the Mont Corris, are artificial but wholly respectable portals. But one who comes in from the mountains of Dauphiné, over a pass that has not even a wagon-road, not to mention a railroad, must be said to have come in at the back door. And that is what I have done today, climbing from Abries on the French side up 2600 feet, over the Col Lacroix, and down 300 feet to Bobbio Pellice where the road begins. The particular attraction of this region, apart from its scenery which is of the best, is that it is the country of the Waldenais.

I had been in Marseilles watching the incoming and outgoing ships, eating marvelous and mysterious sea-food, and visiting the Chateau d'If on its rocky islet in the bay where the Count of Monte Cristo and the Man in the Iron Mask and other notables have been imprisoned from time to time. There is one of the finest views imaginable from the top of the chateau, but the designer of the dungeons was grossly negligent in the matter of providing either scenery or ventilation for the compulsory guests. It could have been the easiest thing in the world to provide a balcony from each cell which would have made confinement there almost a pleasure, but instead they all look through narrow gratings into a dismal court.

Two hundred miles by rail up into the Alps brought me to Briancon, at the end of a branch line. Briancon is surprising in many ways. The first surprise is to find that, in spite of its seeming remoteness, it is so old. One would have thought it would have taken centuries to find the place hidden at the end of difficult gorges which must have been practically impassable until roads had been constructed at infinite pains. Why should they build roads until there was a town to build them to, and how could there be a town until there were roads? The riddle of the chicken and the egg. But the Romans found their way there and built a town, and Charlemagne passed that way, and through the Middle Ages it was a center for both trade and strategy. Half of the famous expeditions that have gone from France into Italy, or vice versa, have passed through Briancon—Hannibal, Caesar, Charles VIII., Napoleon, and others. On studying the map, one can understand it. The passes over the Alps, difficult as they are, are rather easier than elsewhere. If the difficulty was enormous, so also was the pressure of military and economic necessity. So they found a way. And on that way, Briancon was a beautiful halting-place. Two gorges converge to form a smiling little valley frowned down upon by lofty ranges. Two other streams enter this basin on one side, and the combined waters flow away to the south through a narrow passage, making a cultivable and habitable valley in the midst of bleak mountains, with five entrances and exits.

The town itself is built on the sloping top of an almost detached hill at the upper end of the valley, defended by cliffs on three sides, and by a fort, a moat, a wall, and heavy gates, with a drawbridge. The streets are narrow stairways down the center of which, through stone channels, flow little streams of water with startling velocity.

The second surprise is the forts. These are everywhere. From a point of view 2000 feet above the town, and almost directly over it, I counted six large forts occupying commanding sites on spurs of the surrounding mountains, besides a large barracks in the valley, three fortified outlook posts on peaks looking into Italy, and a masked battery on the ridge behind me whose guns, with their long muzzles hidden by the daisies, pointed toward the road that leads from Italy, eight miles away. The forts were built by Vaubau and are now happily obsolete, as most impressive stone fortifications are. Louis XIV's great military engineer must have had a beautiful time fortifying the frontiers of France. One finds his work all through the Pyrenees as well as in the Alps. I went to considerable pains to visit the first of his fortifications that I came within reach of, at Villefranche, but since then I have been unable to avoid them without making impossible detours. They are everywhere. While the forts are probably worthless against modern artillery, the masked battery is relatively recent, and the ammunition cave near by bears the date of 1900 above its door. The forts, antiquated as they are, are still considered forts and not historical relics. They are, with one or two exceptions, manned with soldiers; access to them is prohibited, and the whole neighborhood swarms with uniforms. It looked as though France were expecting an attack from Italy before the end of the week. I wondered whether Italy felt equally suspicious. Presently I found out.

An intelligent Alsatian whom I met in Briancon said that conditions in Alsace are much confused now. It is neither French nor German. He told of a university professor there, a teacher of German literature, who had always thought of himself as a German-speaking Frenchman. Now that he is required to teach in French he is conscious that he has an accent and finds himself looked upon as a French-speaking German.

When I was speaking of my prospective journey across the border into Italy, a man advised me to be sure that my passport was all right. He had been invited to Rome by the king of Italy to give some lectures, but was stopped at the border and sent back because of some technical irregularity in his passport. He showed the king's invitation, but that did no good; back he went.

So I saw to my passport, and set forth toward Italy. Because I wanted to enter the Waldensian valleys, I did not take the road which runs directly from Briancon into Italy over the Col de Mont Genevre, but went south by rail a few miles, then by auto-bus to the end of the road, and, shouldering my knapsack and camera, climbed over the range as I have said. It was a beautiful tramp; none better in the Alps so far as I know. The view from the top of the pass was a tangle of mountains on both sides. Dropping down 2000 feet into a narrow valley of pasture I approached a pleasant inn, the first and last inn in Italy, depending on which way you are going. A gendarme sauntered forth—a pleasant-faced boy with an evident disposition to be agreeable. Had I come over from France? I had. Ah. Beautiful walk and a lovely day after a week of cloudy weather. Then he saw my camera. His jaw dropped. "But what's this?" "Why this is my camera." "A camera! Why, good heavens, don't you know—?" and then came a torrent of Italian that was much too fast for my receiving apparatus, but the gist of which was that cameras were prohibited on the border. This was presently detailed to me slowly and with emphasis. Carrying a camera was prohibissimo. He called for my passport and examined it carefully. It satisfied him as to my right to enter the country. He only remarked that I did not look as old as my picture—which proves that he was a polite and friendly youth. Still, nobody ever looks as old or as vicious as his passport picture. But the camera. He called another soldier and they consulted. There was nothing to do but await the return of the corporal of the guard. Meanwhile I was under arrest and my camera was locked up.

But there were plenty of people to talk with, the conditions of my imprisonment were light. Unlike the Count of Monte Cristo and the Man in the Iron Mask, I had the benefit of all the scenery there was, and there was plenty. A jovial muleteer whom I had met near the top of the pass saw my predicament and said: "Why didn't you give your camera to me up there? I could have hidden it for you in a bundle of hay." Another civilian commented: "These soldiers are all south Italians. A north Italian would never have done such a thing to you."

A young woman, the daughter of a Waldensian pastor who was spending a few days at the inn, gave interesting opinions of Mussolini, whom she both disliked and admired: He is giving Italy what Italy needs, because most of her people are ignorant and need discipline. Those of us who do not need such stern measures ought to submit to them willingly for the sake of the majority who do. He is absolutely without personal ambition. Among her educated friends she never hears a word in his favor and they think she is out of her sense to defend him. She had expected to spend the summer in Paris, but could not get permission to leave the country because of the new edict which prohibits Italians from going outside of Italy for vacations and pleasure-trips. This is to keep the money in Italy. (I had seen an announcement of this edict in the Paris papers but scarcely believed it.) Just before the Fascisti came into power she had accompanied a group of foreign friends on a trip through central and southern Italy and sometimes they had to stay in their hotel rooms for days at a time, by advice of the police, because of popular feeling against foreigners. Now any man, woman, or child can go where he pleases in Italy in perfect safety. "Still," she added with a laugh, "I couldn't go to Paris and you can't leave this inn till the corporal comes."

He came at last, after three agreeable hours of incarceration for me at a table in front of the inn. He was big blonde, a north Italian, I judge, with the Lombard strain still dominant, alert, intelligent, friendly. He went into the case carefully and explained the whole situation to me again. When I pointed out that the camera was a motion-picture camera, more suitable for photographing people in action than military sites and fortifications (which there are none on the Italian side anyway, so far as I could see) he saw a new chance for me. He evidently wanted to let me go if he could. When he looked at my passport, he was greatly relieved. "Oh, so you're an American. Well, of course, no American has any interest in photographing the defenses. It isn't as though you were French." So he gave me back my camera, released me from bondage, and told me to report to the military authorities at Torre Pellice and they would tell me what to do so that I could get back over the border without having more trouble.

So I came on down the valley of the Pellice by a mountain trail which drops down through a series of tiny cultivable spots alternating with gorges, past microscopic villages poised like eagles' nests upon crags, through the country which for 700 years has been the home of the Waldensians and the almost incredible ruggedness of which has been their defense against their enemies in times of persecution. It is a long way from Lourdes to Bobbio, but it is spiritually a still longer way from the intricacy and intolerance of the Roman system to the simplicity and heroic faith of these most primitive Protestants.

Scene I

A DISCIPLE OF THE NIGHT

(Place, a Jerusalem street. Nicodemus and his friend, Joseph, of Arimathea, are returning from a service in the holy temple. As they walk along they discuss the old problem of religion.)

Joseph, of Arimathea: It was a beautiful service today in the holy temple. As I watched the white-robed priests offering sacrifices and listened to the songs of Zion and the old prayers that have come down to us, my soul was stirred within me and like our father, David, "I was glad when they said unto me, let us go into the house of the Lord."

Nicodemus: It was indeed a beautiful service, but it left me with a restless conscience and the deepest aspirations of my soul unsatisfied. The clouds of incense, the march of priests, the slaughter of the lambs and the doves—all the symbolism of that holy place captivates the imagination and charms the senses, but religion ought to mean more than a thrill.

Joseph, of Arimathea: But our fathers have worshiped God after this manner since the days of Moses. Is not the religion of the fathers good enough for you?

Nicodemus: A living man ought not to be in bondage to the dead hand of the past, however sacred that hand may be. Ritualism is not religion, but it may easily become a substitute for religion. Our rabbis have added to the law of Moses a great mass of traditions. They have attempted to bring the whole life of man under the domain of law. In the name of Jehovah we are compelled to do a thousand little things and few of them seem to me to be very important.

Joseph, of Arimathea: What do you regard as important things in religion?

Nicodemus: I suppose what seems important to one may be of little importance to another. Here I am, a mere bundle of flesh and blood and bones. I think, I feel, I dream. I have a certain liberty within narrow limits. Today I am walking with you down the Jerusalem street. Tomorrow, there may be nothing left of me but an corruptible body that in time will return to dust. I want to know if that will be the end of me. Is there a God in the universe? If there is, what attitude does he take toward me, and men like me? I am burdened with a sense of sin and I am not able to resist the temptations that assail me. Is there any power, human or divine, that can help me in my moral struggles? I confess to you that in my religion I find no clear answer to these questions and my obedience to external law has failed to make me a good man.

Joseph, of Arimathea: Nicodemus, you talk like an unbeliever! Such talk is dangerous. If it were reported to the Sanhedrin, of which you are a member, I fear the consequences would be serious. Art thou a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, the Prophet of Galilee?

Nicodemus: I am not. I have heard him speak, but I have never exchanged a word with him.

Joseph, of Arimathea: You will do well to keep away from him. By his dangerous teachings he is leading many of the common people astray.

Nicodemus: But I cannot keep away from him. There is something in him that enthralls me. The other day I stood on the fringe of a crowd and listened to him as he talked to the multitude. He has found the secret of life and I want to know what that secret is. Joseph, there is something godlike in the character of that man. Truth looks out from his eyes, wisdom is enthroned upon his brow, righteousness is stamped upon his face. The other day I saw a man so crippled that he has not been able to walk for years and that man cried out to him as he was passing by, "Jesus, thou son of David, have mercy upon me." And he stood and looked at him for a moment and then said, "Rise, take up thy bed and walk." and the man leaped to his feet and came running and threw himself at the feet of Jesus. I know that he must be a teacher come from God for no man can do the signs which he does except God be with him.

Joseph, of Arimathea: Nicodemus, you will do well to put a guard upon your lips. You are a member of the Sanhedrin. Hundreds of people look to you as an example. If you lend the weight of your influence to this Jesus of Nazareth you may bring death and destruction, not only to yourself, but to many others who follow in your footsteps.

Nicodemus: I have no intention of becoming a disciple of Jesus. Only a fool would sacrifice such a position as I hold to become a follower of a man who is headed to disaster. I am hedged in by a thousand traditions and customs. I am not likely to do anything rash, but I have an inquisitive mind. I am a seeker after truth and I have failed to find it in the religion of our day. This man of Nazareth strikes the note of reality. He deals with the things that are essential. His religion is first hand; it is not something that he has learned out of books, or from men. He knows God and the way of salvation and life everlasting. Some dark night, when the streets are deserted, I may call upon him, for I have learned that he abides in a certain house in this city. Perhaps he may be able to clear up some of my difficulties. Perhaps he may have a balm for my weary and sin-sick soul. I have talked freely to you, my friend, because I know you will not betray my confidence. Pray to the God of my fathers that I may be able to find light and peace and salvation. Farewell.

Joseph, of Arimathea: Farewell, Nicodemus. I warn you that you are traveling on a dangerous road. A man who questions the popular religion of his day is likely to come to grief. Take heed lest that eager, curious mind of thine lead you into taking some step that will bring you into the hands of our religious rulers. They may not be able to answer your questions or bring light to your dark mind, but they can make short work of you and they will do it without hesitation and without mercy.

Scene II

THE SEEKER

(The upper room of a house in Jerusalem, where Jesus is a guest. Time, late evening. In the secret cover of the night Nicodemus, with a mind that is dark with perplexity on the great problems of the soul and God, comes to Jesus seeking light. Nicodemus knocks at the door.)

Servant: Who is there?

Nicodemus: A friend.

Servant: Whom seekest thou?

Nicodemus: The Prophet of Galilee.

Servant: The hour is late, the streets are deserted, the Master is asleep and unless thy case is urgent I will not awaken him.

Nicodemus: My case is urgent. Tell your master that a seeker after God and the way of salvation stands without desiring to talk with him.

(The servant goes away and in a few minutes the door is opened and Nicodemus is ushered into the presence of Jesus, the Prophet of Galilee.)

Jesus: Peace be unto you, O Nicodemus, ruler of the Jews, I have been expecting thee.

Nicodemus: How knowest thou me?

Jesus: I have seen thee standing on the outside of the crowd as I have proclaimed the good news of the kingdom.

Nicodemus: Master, we know that thou art a teacher come from God for no man can do the signs which thou doest except God be with him. I have come to thee with the hope that thou mayest be able to clear up my religious perplexities. Clouds and darkness are all about me and even the light I have is but twilight.

Jesus: Nicodemus, what you need is not new light, but a new heart, not more knowledge, but a vision of God. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born anew he cannot see the kingdom of God.

Nicodemus: How can a man be born anew when he is old? You cannot change the nature of a man. He is what his surroundings and habits have made him. When he arrives at manhood, his character is fixed. I am Nicodemus. I have certain qualities of mind and heart. I have also certain appetites and passions which I share in common with all creatures that have in them the breath of life. How can a man be born anew when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?

Jesus: Nicodemus, a man can be born anew when he is old. He is not in the kingdom by nature, nor by the will of the flesh. That which is born of the flesh is flesh and if ye live after the flesh ye shall die, but, Nicodemus, you are something more than flesh. You are an immortal spirit, dear to the heart of the heavenly Father, who is ever seeking to liberate that immortal spirit and bring you into fellowship with himself. That which is born of the spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I say unto thee, ye must be born anew.

Nicodemus: To be born anew: to get back the innocence of childhood, to have a conscience void of offense, the heart purified, the burden of sin lifted and to know that God is near. Tell me, oh tell me how I may be born anew.

Jesus: Nicodemus, you have read in the law of Moses the story of the fiery serpents that were sent among the people because of their sins and when a great many people had been bitten, Moses, at the command of God, placed a brazen serpent upon a pole and whoever looked to the brazen serpent was healed. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up that whosoever believeth may in him, have eternal life.

Nicodemus: Who is the Son of Man?

Jesus: I who speak unto thee am he. For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life.

Nicodemus: Oh Master, thou hast the words of eternal life and I believe that thou art not merely a teacher come from God, but the very Son of God.

Jesus: He that doeth truth cometh to the light that his works may be made manifest. Nicodemus, you have come to me secretly in the darkness, are you ready to enter into the sunlight of full discipleship?

Nicodemus: Master, if it be known that I am one of thy disciples I shall be put out of the Sanhedrin. I shall be stripped of all honors and position and influence. May be I shall be imprisoned and put to death. Let me be a secret disciple. I hold a position of influence and responsibility. As a secret disciple I shall be able to work from within. I may be able to win some of the leaders of our religion to thy cause.

Jesus: Remember, Nicodemus, whosoever shall save his life shall lose it and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake shall find it. If any man will come after me he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me. Nicodemus, behold the hour is at hand when you will be compelled to choose between me and the world. In that hour when the enemies of the kingdom are triumphant, let the word of mine ring in your ears, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall I confess before my Father and the holy angels and whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I deny also before my Father and his angels. Farewell Nicodemus, thou disciple of the night, thou art not far from the kingdom of God.

Scene III

THE GREAT CONSPIRACY

(Place, Jerusalem. The assembly room of the Sanhedrin. The seventy-one members have been called together by Johnathan, president of the Sanhedrin, to consider what action shall be taken against Jesus, the Prophet of Galilee. Among those present are Nicodemus and Joseph, of Arimathea.)

Johnathan: The false prophet from Galilee, who is known as Jesus, of Nazareth, is in the holy city and is filling Jerusalem with his lying doctrines. Crowds of people are here from Judea, Galilee and from beyond Jordan attending the feast of the tabernacle and this imposter, who is in league with Beelzebub, the prince of demons, hath inflamed the minds of the people that many of them are declaring openly that he is the Messiah who should come. The rulers of the nation the time has come for us to take some action against him.

Joseph, of Arimathea: Would it not be better for us to leave him alone? If we take him seriously it will give him a place of undue importance in the minds of the people. The foolish multitude is always running after religious novelties and this carpenter prophet is the newest thing in religion. Let him have his little day of triumph. He will soon go back to Galilee and in a few months he will be forgotten. A little fire, if left alone, soon burns itself out but if wood be thrown upon it and the wind riseth it will burst forth into a great conflagration. My judgment is to let this little blaze alone. If we keep away from it the prophesy that in a short time there will be nothing left but some dead ashes.

Johnathan: Joseph, if a little fire started in your house I think you would do something more than leave it alone. The way to stop a fire is to put the fire out before it spreads. This firebrand from Galilee must be extinguished before he sets the nation ablaze. As the supreme tribune of the Jewish people, not only in this country, but in every place throughout the world where our people have settlements, we occupy a position of great responsibility. As head of the Sanhedrin I have already ordered Simon, chief officer, to take a guard of our temple police and bring this Jesus of Nazareth, by force, if necessary, into our presence for examination and perhaps condemnation. Hark! I hear the tramping feet of our police marching down the outside court. Order Simon to bring his prisoner into our presence.

(The door is opened and Simon, the chief officer, enters but without a prisoner.)

Johnathan: Where is thy prisoner? Why did you not bring him?

Simon: Never man spake as this man.

Johnathan: Are ye also led astray? Hath any of the rulers believed in him, or any of the Pharisees? But this multitude which knoweth not the law is accursed.

Simon: I scattered the multitude with my men until I came into his presence. I was about to lay my hands upon him when I heard him say, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." I am only a rough soldier and know not the law, as thou sayest, but I am a judge of men. This Jesus is not like other men; he is a prophet of the most high God. Instead of dragging him into thy presence I knelt at his feet, crying out, "Lord give me of this water of life that I may drink." Do with me as you will, but from henceforth I cleave to the Prophet of Galilee.

Johnathan: Simon, for thy disobedience and blasphemy thou art no longer a chief officer. Thou shalt suffer the loss of all thy goods. I cast thee out of the Jewish assembly; from henceforth thou shalt be unto all the faithful as a heathen man and a publican. Be gone! And let us see thy face no more. Members of the Sanhedrin, we need no other witness than the testimony of this man to prove that this false prophet is an enemy of our holy religion. He is a blasphemer and according to the law of Moses ought to be stoned to death.

Nicodemus: I am opposed to any sentence of condemnation. This court commands the confidence of the people, because its decisions are based upon certain laws. We have a law that a man must not be judged except it hear from himself and know what he doeth. We have no legal right to sentence this man to death unless we first hear his testimony and confront him with witnesses. I speak not as a friend of the Galilean, but as a champion of the sacred law of our fathers.

Johnathan: Nicodemus, art thou also of Galilee? Search and see that out of Galilee ariseth no prophet. Moreover, I warn thee that thy sympathy with this deliverer of Galilee may bring to thee the same fate that has overtaken Simon, the chief officer. It is true that thou dost occupy a high position, but the higher the position, the greater and more terrible the fall. Are we agreed that Jesus, of Nazareth, shall be put to death? Let the ballot be taken at this time.

(Ballots are prepared and distributed and after an interval, Johnathan, president of the Sanhedrin, announces the decision.)

Johnathan: Of the seventy-one members voting, sixty-nine are agreed that Jesus, of Nazareth, shall be put to death. Two ballots are in the negative. It seems to be evident that there are two traitors in our midst. Who they are we do not know, although we all have our suspicions. Let us go out from this assembly with these words to all who are friends of the law of Moses and the holy temple: Death and destruction to the Nazarene and to all his followers."

Scene IV

THE GLORIOUS SUNLIGHT OF FULL DISCIPLESHIP

(Place, hill of Golgotha. Time, Friday, of Passion Week. Jesus has been foully put to death. No last minute miracle occurred to save him. The disciples, hopeless and heart broken, have fled for their lives. Apparently all that is left of the new religion that had come out of Galilee, is that poor, bruised, and blood-stained body that is hanging upon the cross. Two men, Nicodemus and Joseph, of Arimathea, still keep their watch round the cross.)

Nicodemus: Thank God his sufferings are ended. I shall never forget the sound of the hammer as it drove the nails through the quivering flesh of his hands and feet. It was like a sword piercing through my own heart.

Joseph, of Arimathea: Yes, he is dead. I heard him cry, "It is finished." I watched the Roman soldier as he thrust the spear through his side. I saw blood and water gush forth. I saw his head droop. I saw the end.

Nicodemus: So you think he is dead?

Joseph, of Arimathea: Yes, he is dead. But there was in him something that no soldier could kill. All the priests and Pharisees and rulers could not destroy it. They have worked their will upon his body and left it broken, but the thing that gave beauty and power and glory to his life escaped them. He triumphs, even in death.

Nicodemus: You talk as if you were one of his disciples.

Joseph, of Arimathea: I am. From henceforth I shall follow him, even to such a death as we have just witnessed. Here, at the cross, the light has dawned upon me.

Nicodemus: Your words fill my heart with joy. When his chosen disciples fled it seemed to me that I stood alone. As I watched him suffering, dying, through the long, black hours, I recalled that he said to me, "Nicodemus, behold the hour cometh when ye shall be compelled to choose between me and the world. In that hour when my enemies are triumphant, remember, whosoever will confess me before men, him I confess before my Father and his holy angels."

Joseph, of Arimathea: Nicodemus, I have a proposal to make to you. If you accept it, it may mean imprisonment and death for both of us. You know that the Romans have a law that when a person is crucified his body must be left upon the cross to decay and become food for vultures, but that law has been modified so that in special cases burial is permitted. We still hold positions of authority and my proposal is that we go to Pilate, the Roman procurator, and ask that the body of Jesus be given to us for burial.

Nicodemus: Gladly will I go with thee on such an errand. But if Pilate grant our request what shall we do with the body of our Lord?

Joseph, of Arimathea: I have a garden and in that garden there is a tomb hewn in stone where never man has yet lain. Here we shall place the body of Jesus.

(The garden four hours later.)

Joseph, of Arimathea: Pilate did not hesitate in granting our request. He confessed that Jesus was innocent of the charges brought against him and that it was fear of the Jews that caused him to give sentence of condemnation.

Nicodemus: What terrible things are caused by fear. If the priests and the Pharisees had not been afraid of Jesus, they would not have proposed to put him to death. If Pilate had not feared that a refusal to crucify Jesus would get him into trouble with the authorities at Rome, he would not have this awful crime upon his conscience. If Simon Peter had not been afraid, he would not, with oaths, have denied his Lord. If I had not been afraid of losing my position as a member of the Sanhedrin, I should have publicly enrolled myself as a disciple of Jesus and perhaps my example would have been followed by others. Fear creates unhappiness, makes cowards of us all, and paralyzes our activities. For the first time in my life I have peace in my soul. A secret disciple is always an unhappy disciple. It may be that tomorrow we shall be thrown into prison, but even so we have made the good confession. We are no longer disciples of the night. Let us go to our homes. Mary Magdalene and the other Mary stand yonder keeping watch at the sepulcher over the body of Jesus. They are not afraid. They have the perfect love which casteth out all fear. Light and love and goodness are imprisoned in that tomb. I look for a resurrection.

"Greater Works Than These"

The story of an unselfish labor of love

BY G. CLIFFORD CRESS

A BEAUTIFUL baby boy, three hours old, was asleep in the nursery as I peeped in at the rows of white baskets awaiting other arrivals. This baby, who had arrived at noon, had the proud distinction of being the first to be born in the new Midway hospital, St. Paul, Minn., dedicated to the divine ministry of which Jesus spoke when he said, "Greater works than these shall ye do." As I went down the corridor from the nursery, I met a woman with silvered hair walking slowly toward her room, steadying her steps with a cane. These two, the new-born babe and the mature woman, complete the circumference of human life which encircles the benevolent influence of this organized ministry of mercy.

I found rooms in this modern hospital for the accommodation of 100 patients. In one of these rooms, which has a pleasant outlook to the south, was a lad who had never been able to walk, but was now almost ready to run and play like any normal child. In another white room, a doctor was removing the bandages from the eyes of a little girl in the hope that she might see the sunshine and the flowers upon which she had never gazed. Up and down the corridors I went, looking in here and going in there, to find youth and age trying to be cheerful throughout their first surgical experience, yielding to the scientific treatment which is at its best in this modern hospital.

From Small Beginnings

The building of this Baptist hospital in the twin cities is the latest, but not the last, chapter in a remarkable story of achievement. Twenty-five years ago the idea of a hospital took root in the souls of certain members of the First Swedish Baptist church of St. Paul. Some of these, like the heroes of faith in olden times, "died without receiving the promises," but the idea lived on. The initial effort to develop an institution resulted in the building of the first unit of the Mounds Park sanitarium. It was soon overflowing with patients. One extension after another was added, a training school for nurses developed and the sphere of its influence reached out further and further until seven states are now represented on its board of managers.

During the last quarter of a century the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis have experienced a large growth. New industrial centers have developed and the cities are linked together by beautiful boulevards. Naturally there was a large fringe of population where the two cities converge that was not cared for adequately by hospitals. Such institutions had been located in the older and more thickly settled parts. This challenge was met by the purchase of a beautifully wooded eight-acre lot in a strategic center close to University avenue, the main arterial highway between the two cities. Here the new Midway hospital was opened to the public in July, 1926, and dedicated with impressive services.

The building and equipment today represent a value of $750,000. Built in the shape of a capital letter Y, 75 per cent of its rooms receive the sunlight. From the great boilers located in the sub-basement to the operating rooms on the fifth floor, every department contains the latest equipment approved by medical science and world-wide experience.

A modern hospital is as complicated as the human body which it is built to serve. At first glance, it, like the body, seems a simple thing of few parts. But a careful scrutiny reveals a bewildering array of departments unsuspected by the average layman. The immense furnaces, steam distributing systems, water breakers and purifiers, pumps, dynamos, elevators, diet kitchen, cold storage, sterilizing units, culture laboratories, X-ray department, offices and operating rooms with lights that cast no shadows, all work like trained servants to minister to human need. Utilization of space and efficiency of operation are related here so harmoniously that the busy program of the day goes forward without commotion, irritation or delay. Much of the building, due to the type of construction and material used, is sound proof. The long halls are floored with rubber laid on cement. The chaste, simple lines of the exterior, and the quiet perfection of interior arrangement and equipment give assurance of rest and recuperation.

The touch of the hospital depends much on its corps of nurses. Quiet, resourceful young women in their distinctive garb go about their ministrations of mercy. The fact that most of them are trained here impresses one with the splendid service which the association is rendering through its school of nursing. Young women of approved character and with certain educational requirements enter the hospital for training under the best modern conditions. The ministry of healing has always appealed to women. It offers a worthy field for the expression of natural sympathy reinforced by the spirit of the great Healer. The training department is an accredited school registered with the state board of Minnesota and the R. N. degree from this institution gives a nurse standing anywhere in the civilized world. A number of its alumni are in home and foreign service as medical missionaries.

This hospital venture has developed a feeling of unity among the Baptists of the Northwest. Practically all the foreign-speaking groups are solidly back of this enterprise. They feel that Jesus found a happy route into the souls of men through the healing of their bodies. They believe that any adequate interpretation of his teaching must place emphasis upon this practical sympathy for the sick and suffering in the program of the churches. This bit of cooperative effort is promoting larger and finer brotherhood.

Community Cooperation

The new temple of healing demonstrates a spirit of community cooperation not often equaled. It has been the time-honored custom of Baptists not to exploit the communities where they develop work of any sort. They have prided themselves that as a matter of conscience and precedent their institutions are largely the direct result of their own effort and support. But here the community took such a keen interest in this project for unselfish service that all types of people united with the Baptists and provided one-third of the total funds for the enterprise. They did it cheerfully and made the occasion one of civic pride. Indeed, the formal opening of the temple preceding the dedication was marked by a community-day celebration in which thousands from the neighborhood took part. Vigorous group action and leadership on the part of Baptists materialized in a gift of a quarter of a million dollars from friendly folk who wished to share the of unselfish service. This fact explains how the temple was opened without debt.

The successful erection and opening of this plant stimulates thought as to what others are doing in this sphere of activity. It is reported that the Roman Catholic church has about 650 hospitals in the United States. The Methodists have their hospital system served by their own nurses

And for the contemplative soul there is an atmosphere of rare romance about this new temple of healing. It marks a new era. Around it are many stately trees which sheltered the Indians of yesterday. Nearby are the falls of Minnehaha, laughing waters, immortalized by Longfellow in his "Hiawatha." On this spot lived the mighty Sioux who ruled from the Great lakes to the Rocky mountains.

and specially trained workers. They report forty-five new hospitals as a part of their present foreign program. A large part of these are being built in Europe. Southern Baptists have eighteen, and at an expense of three and a half millions of dollars they are building four more. They are also building a new million-dollar tuberculosis hospital. There are about 1700 institutions in the United States directed by Protestants and dedicated to some form of hospital service. But among them, Northern Baptist hospitals are few and far between.

The new Midway hospital, with its ample sphere of service, is a striking example of what a few consecrated men can do in aiding others to find a means of expression for that unselfish desire often most difficult to express. It vividly stirs the imagination and demonstrates a type of Christian service that Baptists with their individualistic emphasis have largely missed. Organization and cooperation with intelligent leadership make possible many vicinities that for an individual or a local church are impossible. These institutions, the two hospitals and the school for nursing now operated by the Northwestern Baptist Hospital Association, create no material profits for any one. The work is an unselfish labor of love.

The growing equipment is open day and night for any reputable physician or surgeon. They are all welcome to come and bring their patients and they will receive the best service available. The doors are open also to all patients alike. Confessing all faiths, speaking various languages, representing widely different cultures, but sharing together a common burden of suffering, they come. They stay for a day, a week, a month, conscious of the presence of the healing Christ among his people today as he was of old by the shores of Galilee.

These ancient trees have seen the yesterday of the red man vanish. They have seen the teepee give place to the skyscraper, the campfire to the flaming forge of industry and the wickiup of the medicine-man to the organized adventures of modern medicine. Another race now lives on the bluffs along the "Father of Waters" and there is an emerging world wherein all things are becoming new. And in this new order the hospital is added to the church and the school, a trinity of benevolence in which the spirit and aim of the Christ are at once the inspiration and the goal.

The Eternal Quest

BY KATHERINE ZINZ

*OH God,
Great men and small have sought for thee
all through the ages,
In human faces and between book pages.
They've delved beneath the earth and gazed into far spaces,
And they have found a part of thee in all these places.*

*We thank thee, God, that we can never fully comprehend thee;
That there is always more of thee for us to find.
We only pray, Oh Lord, for endless patience
To seek and delve for thee with heart and mind.*

The Devotional Life

Where They Found Him

"And when they had found him."—Mark 1:37.

BY GEORGE H. MORRISON

THERE are people of whom we say admiringly that we always know where we will find them. At any hour of any given day we know where they are to be met. But I venture to say with the most perfect reverence that no one ever could say that of Christ. That was one of the wonders of his life. Appointments may be precious, but what a charm there is in unexpected meetings, when suddenly in the crowd we see a face, and then the sun shines out even in December. People were always finding Christ like that, suddenly, in diverse places.

The Manger

Let us take the wise men from the East. They found him in a manger. It was the most unlikely place in the world for one who had been heralded by stars. I remember going down a coal-mine years ago with a friend. We stumbled along a mile of tunnel, and then came on a man working in a hollow. My guide, who was the local minister, pointing to the stooping figure, said, "That is the brightest Christian in my parish." Then I thought of the wise men from the East finding Christ in that unlikely manger. I thought of the rowers upon the Lake of Galilee finding him upon the stormy sea. I thought of the penitent thief upon the cross finding the desire of all the nations amid the shame and agony of Calvary. That is one of the wonders of the Lord. He is found in the most unlikely places, in lives where one would never think to light on him, and in the most unpromising circumstances. He is found in India, in Manchuria, among the hills and glens of Livingstonia, and in the savage islands of the Pacific ocean. How often, studying the Old Testament, is the Lord found in unlikely places; not in the royal splendors of Isaiah, but in seemingly desolate and barren tracts. So the magi, dreaming of kingly furnishings and of cradles wrought with curious art, found him a little babe among the beasts.

The Temple

Then, passing on a little, one remembers how his parents found him in the temple. It is a story familiar to us all. The wisest sages of the land were there, but Mary and Joseph did not heed them. The courts were echoing with music, but I question if Mary heard it. Like a morning of sunshine after a night of weeping was the sight of Jesus to his mother's eyes, and she and Joseph found him in the church; not in the streets where rolled the tide of traffic; not amid the chaffering of bazaars; but in the beautiful place where God was worshiped, with its altar and its mercy-seat. To this hour, wherever folk are gathered to worship God in singleness of heart, the Lord reveals himself as present. Through song and prayer, or when the word is preached, or in mystical ways the mind can never fathom, how many become conscious of that presence which makes all the difference in the world? What new meaning does it give to church-going if we practice it in the quiet assurance that we shall meet the chief among ten thousand there?

The Solitary Place

Again, one recalls how his disciples found him in the solitary place. To me that is of infinite suggestiveness. All the evening before he had been busy, healing sicknesses and working miracles. Virtue had been passing out of him, for when he gave a cure he gave himself. Then in the morning, long before the sunrise, he had risen and stolen quietly away; and they found him in the solitary place, all alone, round him the infinite solitude of nature. To me there is a parable in that. To many a young man there comes the day when his spirit is thrilled by Emerson or Shakespeare. But Shakespeare and Emerson do not stand alone; there are other essayists and other poets. You find them moving in a glorious company, and look at them and call them men of genius; but you find Christ in the solitary place. Genius is a thing of less, or more. It has its chosen child in every century. Genius may be an all-subduing flame, or it may be a tiny spark. But the one thing you can never do with Christ is to regard him as belonging to a class; you find him in the solitary place. In the unconditional obedience he calls for, in his unparalleled and stupendous claims, in his immediate knowledge of the father, in his total unconsciousness of sin, Christ stands alone, confronting every one of us. We find him in the solitary place.

The Common Highway

Lastly, one recalls that there were those who found him on the common highway. Who does not know the matchless story of the two who found him on the Emmaus road? There rolled the wagon. There the chariot dashed. There marched the legions of the empire. There was the merchant traveling on business; there, the prodigal returning home. It was the common highway, free to everybody, open to the beggar and to the emperor; and there the two disciples found the Lord. Sometimes that common road is dusty. The heart faints and the feet grow weary on it. We wonder if we shall have strength to travel it till in the hour of evening we win home. But what a difference it makes, what a blessed and amazing difference, when like the two going to Emmaus we find him on the common road! He makes so much of our worrying ridiculous; we forget it all in company with him. He is so radiant, so full of loving hopefulness, so absolutely sure of God. In that companionship life blossoms. We have courage for the darkest mile. We recapture, even when the shadows are falling, the burning of the heart.—The British Weekly.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topic for October 10

FALLING IN LOVE WITH JESUS

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in Young People's Leader, the official magazine for all Baptist young people. Subscriptions to the Leader may be made through the B. Y. P. U. of America, at $1 per year.)

The worship period of this meeting should be made truly devotional, with the suggestions given in the Leader put into use. In presenting the topic, perhaps you could show how "love grows."

On a blackboard draw a vertical bar, lettering it with the word "Love." Then ask for suggestions as to what love makes possible in human character. The thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians will give you the following outgrowths of love: humility, unselfishness, truthfulness, faith, knowledge, loyalty, courage, kindness, patience, and hope. As each of these is mentioned, a sort of branch, or horizontal bar, could be drawn on the side of the "love" bar, and the word written therein. You will have a sort of tree, the trunk of which is love, and the branches the virtues.

As these "branches" are added, the leader or some group member might tell how love begets the virtue which the branch represents, using some of the material as given in the Leader and anything else which might come to mind.

Then show that Christ had all these qualities in his life and thus had a life of love. Perhaps the young people could be asked if these qualities in a person are not what make us love him, bringing in several illustrations of people who are loved by many, such as Lincoln, Florence Nightingale, etc.

To make the fact more impressive, the word "Love" could be erased from the vertical bar and the word "Jesus" written in. Then, in conclusion, using the thought as given in the Leader, that we become like that which we love, show that any one of our names could be placed in that vertical bar if we loved Christ, and that if they were so placed, others seeing the bar might read "Jesus" rather than our names.

Ocean Park

Those two words go far in describing the New England school of methods held the last two weeks of August. Ocean Park: it is indeed a "park," with the ocean to enhance its enjoyment. Back a few blocks from the tide-swept beach in the midst of "the murmuring pines and hemlocks" is set this magnetic center of New England Baptists' summer interests.

September 26 Topic A PRISON PRAYER OPENS BURMA

CHRIST THE DIVINE KING
For a full treatment of these topics see Young People's Leader.

Started years ago by the Free Baptists as a summer conference, Ocean Park has become the summer home of many hundreds of New England Baptists. The Ocean Park Association itself has a temple with a seating capacity of 1400 and two halls with small auditoriums and several classrooms. To this the New England Baptist School of Methods has added its Bethshalom and English halls with dormitories for the faculty, classrooms, business offices, parlors and dining rooms. These have been built on property purchased several years ago which has been sub-divided and much of which is now covered with summer homes and cottages such as make up the greater part of Ocean Park itself.

This was the rendezvous in August of over 1000 earnest Baptists of New England, desiring to train themselves more effectively for work in church, Sunday school, guild and society. Every day of the two weeks 1000 Baptists, more than half of whom were young people, swarmed over these grounds from class to class, meal to meal and event to event.

A School Indeed

To attract 1000 people for two weeks' summer study demands something bordering on a real educational institution. That is what the New England school of methods is. Every day there were sixty-eight subjects taught in the five class periods by forty instructors. And besides this, there were the daily chapel and evening gatherings. In fact, one easily imagined himself caught in the midst of a college season, so big and yet so smoothly and punctually was the institution run. It is perhaps these two things that distinguish Ocean Park school of methods from other assemblies of the denomination—its size and its corresponding efficiency, for all of these 1000 were in classes. It is great because it is big, and it is big because it is great.

But it was not all school in the sense of study and work. As with all such summer gatherings it had its recreational side. Of course, surf bathing attracted nearly all, swimmers and non-swimmers, for in sea water one has little fear of not staying afloat. Then there was tennis, baseball, quoits and similar sports. And for some, deep sea fishing.

The Spirit of the Camps

One of the unique features of Ocean Park is the two camps—Hasseltine and Judson, with their heart stirring ritual and meaningful insignia.

In this year's group of 1000 there were seen constantly girls with the white and blue arm bands lettered with C. H. and young men with the sweaters lettered with a red and green C. J. To the visitor or casual observer, these lettered arm bands and sweaters meant little. To the nearly 300 young women, and the more than 180 young men, they meant all that the Greek-letter emblems or the athletic awards mean to their possessors. To them it meant the heart of Ocean Park.

The visitor or casual observer, along with the "old timer," became conscious of the soul of these insignia on graduation day. The award of chevrons for second and third year "campers" and letters to the first year campers of "Judson" and the turning right side out of the arm bands for the "Hasseltine" campers left nothing to be guessed as to why these two camps are the heart of all that Ocean Park stands for. After witnessing this scene one little wonders why so many return to the "camps" the second and third years, and some the fifth and sixth years.

Ready for the Call

A school? One is more certain of it than ever at the graduation exercises. To see over 100 young men and women seated on the platform and later pass across and receive their diplomas and stand at attention in four long rows across the front of the auditorium below the platform while the dedicatory prayer is made, is to feel one's self back at his alma mater. Hearts that have beat weakly for recent years beat vigorously again.

So many are there to receive credits for the first and second years' work that public recognition is impossible. Credits for the first year's work must be mailed—and are mailed—home the day of graduation. The second year credits are received by those entitled thereto following the close of the formal graduation service.

And all of this is crowned in the Life Work call. Chapel services, classes, prayer groups, interviews and campus chats have prepared many for a forward step in life. Hence it was no surprise that on Life Work night more than 350 young people signed and turned in cards indicating a definite way in which the future will see their lives more fully consecrated to the Master's service.

The Chimney Corner

The Corner Where You Are

By CAMELIA MERRIAM

MARY AND I had taken some of the necessities of life to a family living in the slums of the city—the slummiest sort of slums, with hundreds of children to the block, a fetid odor in the air, dirt on the sidewalks, on the windows, on the children's clothes and faces. Not a sign of color or beauty for blocks, until, in the very center of that desert of dirt and destitution we came upon such a riot of color and beauty that it seemed as though heaven must have taken pity on the aridity of the existence of the creatures in these crowded, ugly blocks and spilled a rainbow down among them. But it was a fragrant rainbow as well as a colorful one.

An unpainted cottage of not more than four rooms, sagging on its side, sat back about twenty feet from the city pavement. The lot was about twenty feet wide, and in that plot of twenty by twenty feet there grew and blossomed flowers of every hue under the sun. Hollyhocks—pink, yellow, red, white, lavender—nodded along the side borders. A bed of yellow, white, red and pink four-o'clocks was responsible for most of the fragrance. Peppermint, beginning to top off in delicate lavender plumes, also gave off its perfume. Zinnias, verging from the most flaunting colors to the delicate pastel shades, splashed almost one-half of the yard with color. Pink, blue and white larkspur, orange-yellow calendulum, delicate lady-slippers, pink and white and purple asters just beginning to fringe into bloom, velvety marigolds—what wonder that we clung to the picket fence and stared quite properly, for no seeing person could pass such a place by. Our long lingering drew from the doorway—it was a clean doorway with scrubbed steps, and the windows of the sagging little house shone as only good suds and clean cloths and much rubbing can make them shine—a wisp of a woman, slightly stooped, in a gray calico dress and a blue-and-white gingham apron—the tie-around-your-waist kind. She was evidently not far from the seventies, perhaps in them, for her eyes had the bright, farseeing look that old eyes often get when they begin to glimpse the city not made by hands.

"Maybe you'd like a bouquet," she said in a voice that even yet had a bird note in it.

"But others—the people around here—need them more," said Mary.

"There are enough for them, too," said the woman eagerly, as though she longed to give.

"Then we'd love them!" I cried.

"Such a heavenly spot!" said Mary.

No Time

By W. H. DAVIES

WHAT is this life if, full of care,
We have no time to stand and stare?

*No time to stand beneath the boughs
And stare as long as sheep and cows.
No time to see, when woods we pass
Where squirrels hide their nuts in grass.
No time to see in broad daylight,
Streams full of stars, like skies at night.
No time to turn at Beauty's glance
And watch her feet how they can dance.
No time to wait till her mouth can Enrich the smile her eyes began.
A poor life this if, full of care,
We have no time to stand and stare.*

"You've worked a piece of magic here! Why—would you mind telling us why your place is so different?"

"I'd like to tell," said the woman, looking up at us from the candy-tuft border, her bright brown eyes eager yet shy, "You see, I've always felt you should make just wherever you are a better place because you are there."

"There was a time when I had—when I lived—well, any way, when I never thought I'd live in an old house like this and on such a mean street. It came to me through the will of an uncle that died—just to live in as long as I live. And so I said to myself 'Well, Sarah Lou, if that's to be your corner, just you brighten it up and make it worth while—make it a blessing to every one about you.' And so that's—well that's all there is to it—except that, well—when you do begin brightening your corner it just makes a regular glow over your whole life—even if that life does look sort of dark to other folks."

We've paraffined some of those flowers and put them in one of the choicest vases in our living room.

Which Is Your Star?

DO YOU wish to know which star on the flag stands for your state? Have you the patience to find it?

On the blue field of the United States flag there are forty-eight white stars. These stars are arranged in a rectangle of six horizontal rows of eight stars in a row. Each star in the field represents a particular state in the American union in the chronological order in which it was admitted, writes Norbury W. Thornton in The National Republic.

The eight states in the first row of stars in order are: Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland and South Carolina.

The eight states in the second row of stars in order are: New Hampshire, Virginia, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee.

The eight states in the third row of stars in order are: Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Maine, Missouri.

The eight states in the fourth row of stars in order are: Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota.

The eight states in the fifth row of stars in order are: Oregon, Kansas, West Virginia, Nevada, Nebraska, Colorado, North Dakota, South Dakota.

The eight states in the sixth row of stars in order are: Montana, Washington, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Oklahoma, Arizona, New Mexico.

Another Bugaboo Killed

By ESTELLE BATES

"FOR EVERY worry under the sun there is either a cure or there is none.

If there is one try and find it; If there is none never mind it"—it was the never-mind-it attitude that tried to take on peach stains, but not very successfully. I could scarcely resist a shriek when I saw our guest peel a peach and wipe his hands on one of my monogrammed napkins; or when Cuddly rubbed a peach on the lovely hand-made linen dress that her adoring Aunt Julia had sent her; or when Junior turned over his dish of peaches on the four-yard very best damask tablecloth. The never-mind-it attitude was such a dismal failure with me that I decided to tack to the other course and I went after a cure. I went at it in a businesslike fashion. I wrote to every one I couldn't see face to face and I asked every person I met, even the president of our men's college: "Do you know of anything that will remove peach stains?" I got a dozen answers suggesting something that occasionally did remove them, but nothing satisfied me until I tried the method suggested by the president of the college. "My mother used to use glycerine—she just soaked the stain in it and she said that it always came out. I never tried it myself; of course, but mother was generally right."

She was in this case at least.

Near East Relief finds on its hand 50,000 Armenian and Russian refugees who are stranded in Bulgaria. The Bulgarian government is unable to take care of them because it has the task of providing for more than 200,000 Bulgarian refugees from adjoining countries. Golden Rule Sunday, to be observed in the interest of the Near East Relief, is announced for Dec. 5.

BOYS and Girls

Mother

BY LOLA RIDGE

YOUR love was like moonlight
Turning harsh things to beauty,
So that little wry souls
Reflecting each other obliquely
As in cracked mirrors
Behold in your luminous spirit
Their own reflection
Transfigured as in a shining stream,
And loved you for what they were not.

You are less an image in my mind
Than a luster.
I see you in gleams
Pale as starlight on a gray wall, Evanescent as the reflection of a white swan
Shimmering in broken water.

Dear Boys and Girls:

It seems to me that Marianna's letter came just in the nick of time, for I very much want to remind you of the thousands of dolls needed for the Japanese trip in November and December. There is not any too much time left, and you will be missing the greatest fun if you don't do what Marianna is doing in Boston, and hundreds of other girls are doing all over America—dressing dolls, and naming them, and writing little notes, so that some happy Japanese girl may learn to love you. And through you, learn to love all America. Won't you please write me a letter, every single one of you who is at work on a doll? Tell us how you are working together in your city, and how your doll is to look. Send letters to

MISS MARGARET T. APPLEGARTH, 14 Arnold Park,
Rochester, New York.

Dear Young Explorers:

I am busy making a doll to go to Japan and I think it's a wonderful idea. I know a lady who lived in Japan for years and years, and she says the dolls' festival is one of the prettiest feasts of the whole year; the little girls all wear bright kimonos and have a wonderful time playing with their dolls. She says that Japan feels very much hurt because the United States has been trying to keep Japanese out of America. So it is a lovely thing for the American children to send all these thousands of dolls to the Japanese children, for they are sure to feel friendlier toward us. I am making a middy blouse for my doll, and little bloomers underneath a pleated skirt, so that the girl who gets my doll will know how I dress for school and for playing. Then I want to have time to make a "dressy" dress too. All the girls in a little club I belong to are working on dolls to send to Japan. Some one we know heard all about it at Northfield, so when I knew Baptists were working on it too I was glad I was a Baptist. How nice it would be if all the explorers who read this could work on dolls for Japan!

With loving hopes,

Dear Miss Applegarth:

I have been spending my summer traveling out West. I did not know our country was so big. You can travel mile after mile after mile over prairies, and day after day. It must be lonely in the prairies, with nobody near. The national parks are wonderful. I was often scared on the rides we took, with precipices on one side of the road, for it would not be much fun to fall down 1000 feet. I am out West now and thought maybe you would like to have a letter from a young explorer who has just explored Pike's peak. It was nice up there and a wide view. Have you ever been 'out West? Your loving friend,

Dopshun in Search of a Mother

Chapter IV

IT was exactly a year later that the great painter Troyan Oxenhall, asked permission to paint a picture of Magnhild and her new mother. Magnhild could hardly believe her ears!

"What will you call it?" the tall lady asked.

"Sleeping Beauty," he answered, smiling, and needless to say the little girl was amazed. Straight hair! A long nose! She, a sleeping beauty?

But the artist smiled again as he pinched her cheek: "There's something deep inside you, my dear, which has been

The Mother in the House

BY HERMANN HAGEDORN

FOR such as you, I do believe,
Spirits their softest carpets weave,
And spread them out with gracious hand
Wherever you walk, wherever you stand.

For such as you, of scent and dew
Spirits their rarest nectar brew,
And where you sit and where you sup
Pour beauty's nectar in your cup.

For all day long, like other folk,
You bear the burden, wear the yoke,
And yet when I look in your eyes at eve
You are lovelier than ever, I do believe.

kissed awake. It shines through your eyes when you look at your mother."

Magnhild had to look at her mother then, of course, and a warm, gay little smile slipped around her lips and something lovely really did shine in her eyes: "But it's mother who's so beautiful," she said.

The tall lady gave him a wise little look: "Paint your picture to suit yourself, Troyan; but you've known me all my life and you never wanted to paint me before, so don't you think you'd better call it: 'And a Little Child Shall Lead Them?'"

For there is something rather wonderful about relationships, and most of us who have had parents all our lives are not nearly grateful enough for the fact that when God made the world "he set the solitary in families!"

Songs for My Mother

BY ANNA HEMPSTEAD BRANCH

MY mother has the prettiest tricks
Of words and words and words,
Her talk comes out as smooth and sleek
As breasts of singing birds.

She shapes her speech all silver fine
Because she loves it so,
And her own eyes begin to shine
To hear her stories grow.

And if she goes to make a call
Or out to take a walk,
We leave our work when she returns
And run to hear her talk.

We had not dreamed these things were so
Of sorrow and of mirth,
Her speech is as a thousand eyes
Through which we see the earth.

God wove a web of loveliness,
Of clouds and stars and birds,
But made not anything at all
So beautiful as words.

They shine around our simple earth
With golden shadowings,
And every common thing they touch
Is exquisite with wings.

There's nothing poor and nothing small
But is made fair with them.
They are the hands of living faith
That touch the garment's hem.

They are as fair as bloom or air,
They shine like any star,
And I am rich who learned from her
How beautiful they are.

A regular verb is defined by a Chicago school child as a verb we use every day.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

PRINT SERMONS IN CHURCH CALENDAR

The Trumpet Call is the name of an interesting weekly church bulletin issued by the Walnut Street church, Waterloo, Iowa. Rev. Warren L. Steeves, pastor, is the editor. The bulletin contains the announcements for the week, a number of general articles of a devotional character, notes on the Sunday-school lesson, and a sermon by the pastor.

CURRENT EXPENSES THRIVE WITH MISSIONS

The First church of Muskegon, Mich., went over the top last year with its missionary offering, and has accepted an additional $300 on its quota for this year. The pastor, Dr. S. R. McCurdy, says, "As usual when a church does this sort of thing, the local expense budget is being met more easily and of larger amount than heretofore, while at the same time the pledges for the extension and new lots are coming in well."

POSTER COMPETITION IN OHIO

The department of missionary cooperation for Ohio has announced an interesting poster contest to take place among the churches in the state during the present fiscal year. There will be a committee to judge the various posters, which are to be submitted by the churches at the close of the denominational year, and three awards will be issued for the first, second, and third choices of the committee. The posters are to be judged on their effectiveness in the stimulation of prompt payment of pledges for the missionary work of the denomination.

The conditions of the contest are simple. The poster may be of any size or design except a copy of the familiar stairway poster, although adaptations of this idea will be accepted. The poster must be used at least from October to April, and show how it was used. It must be in the state office not later than May 15, 1927. It must be accompanied by a description of the way in which it was used and the effect it had on the payment of pledges. The record of payment of pledges to local expenses may be incorporated, and it is preferred that it should be.

The state department of missionary cooperation announces that it has several "bright ideas" for posters and will be pleased to correspond with any one desiring suggestions, and adds that this is a splendid opportunity for the young people to be of service to the church and the kingdom. It is hoped that from the posters submitted, one may be selected for use as the official state poster for 1927-28, and the right to do so is claimed by the department.

THEIR BENEVOLENCE BUDGET THE LARGER

The published report of the First church of Cleveland, Ohio, for the year ending Nov. 30, 1925, shows that contributions to denominational benevolences were $1.07 against every dollar for current expenses, and for total benevolences, both denominational and non-denominational, $1.12. The church has a strong committee on benevolences.

RECORD SUMMER CONGREGATIONS

During the rebuilding of the First church of Columbus, Ohio, the congregation has occupied the largest downtown theater in the city. In the midst of a hot vacation season, the congregations have grown beyond all anticipations, the night audiences reaching from 1200 to 1400 or more.

NO "SUMMER SLUMP" IN THIS CHURCH

That the generally expected "summer slump" in church activities is not an absolute necessity is proven by the record for the present summer of the First church of Hamilton, Ohio.

For one thing, the Sunday school has increased until 970 persons were registered in attendance on Sunday, July 11. There was a contest between the men's class of this church and the Stiles Bible class of Middletown, Ohio, with the Hamilton class registering 425 men in attendance. The local theater was used to house this immense class. The adult women's classes were also compelled to move out of the church building into the Y. M. C. A. two blocks away, on account of lack of space in the church. Attendance at the combined B. Y. P. U. open air services every Sunday night was estimated between 200 and 500 per Sunday.

The new church budget for September was presented and adopted, and the finance committee began work at once on the details of the machinery for the annual every-member canvass on the first Sunday in September. In addition to its other activities, the church handled daily vacation Bible-school services.

SCOTTSBLUFF, SELF-SUPPORTING

The Scottsbluff church, Nebraska, after a careful survey under the leadership of Pastor Bukoutz and the finance committee, aided by Convention Pastor Shar, has voted to become self supporting. The church put on a carefully planned every-member canvass and secured a sufficient number of pledges to bring it to a self-supporting basis. The church will still pay its mission budget in full as adopted.

ELOQUENT FACTS

The progress of the Baptist church of Adrian, Mich., is indicated by the fact that in two years pledges to current expenses have increased from $5300 to $7283; a gain of 37.4 per cent. The number of persons pledging increased from 345 to 429. In benevolence the increase was 38.2 per cent, and the number of persons pledging increased from 171 to 274. The current expense budget, $7675, fully covered; the benevolence budget is $2800, more than covered by pledges. There are 486 resident members. Rev. M. Forrest Ashbrook is pastor of this church.

CHURCH TO HAVE DIRECTOR OF ACTIVITIES

The advisory board of the First church of Joliet, Ill., has announced the appointment of Mr. Allen Doughty as director of activities for the church. Mr. Doughty will have entire charge of the athletic program and assist in all recreational work of the church, and also in religious education. Mr. Doughty has been doing settlement work in Chicago previous to taking this position.

NEW STEREOPTICON CATALOG

The catalog of stereopticon lectures for the fall is ready for distribution from the stereopticon depositories and stock offices. Get your copy at once and place orders early. Many churches have already booked lectures, one a month, for the balance of the fiscal year.

SEND DELEGATES TO ASSEMBLY

The Baptist church of Wolcott, Ind., decided to invest some of its funds in sending delegates to the summer assembly at Franklin. In order to determine which members were most fit to go, they conducted an examination. Two young ladies qualified by getting high grades and were accordingly sent to the assembly.

Among Ourselves

West China Letter

By JOE TAYLOR

THIS letter is written 6300 feet above sea-level. We are on our vacation and have climbed this mountain in search of cool air and sleep-filled nights. Down on the plain it is possible to get to sleep by midnight but one wakes at dawn. The necessary mosquito net, tucked in around the bed, shuts out most of the air. The little which seeps through is hot and humid and one tosses about in search of sleep for hours. But in the hills he can be assured of sleep that "knits up the ravelled sleeve of care." So here we are with a thick cloud of fog coming into the bungalow. We have days of sunshine, as well as lots of rain which is more acceptable than one in America would suppose. We are so high up that there are no springs on the mountain top; we have to catch the water from the bark roof in order to have a supply on hand. This is done by planting big water-butts at the corners of the bungalow. These receptacles are poorly made. Yesterday our bungalow looked as if we were getting ready for a sale of household goods, for nearly every receptacle that would hold water was planted where the water troughs leaked. We got the water and are rejoicing in a family wash day. But these minor inconveniences are forgotten when bed-time comes and one wraps himself in two woolen blankets and a steamer rug. There are no mosquitoes, so we dispense with the air-excluding net and are off to dreamland in a jiffy.

Summer School

However, there are some of our number who cannot get this relief from summer heat. The West China Union university conducts a summer school each year which calls for a few missionaries on the teaching staff. This year we had a large and successful summer Bible school. Rev. Donald Fay, of the Chengtu Baptist church, was the efficient principal, and one of our students for the ministry acted as secretary. The attendance of about 150 included sixty women. The student body is made up mainly of evangelists and church workers from country places. They get a sufficient amount of regular class work to make the course of intellectual benefit; but other features contribute as much to their spiritual growth. The life of the average country preacher in West China is monotonous, save for robber raids and the exactions of the soldiers. It is a long process of giving out with little opportunity to acquire added knowledge or inspiration. Think what a month at the provincial capital and at the only university in West China means to these intellectually starved workers. Lectures in the evening, games in the afternoon, social intercourse at other hours, and visits to the city churches on Sunday make this month a feast of fat things. The student returns to his post refreshed in mind and spirit.

This introduces one of the most important and pressing problems that the church of Christ in China has to face, the rural community. It is not inclusive enough to call it the rural church, for the church is only one part of the community. The village and farm life with its gray monotony and lack of interests

Cooperative Agreement on Evangelism and Promotion

THE Northern Baptist Convention definitely adopted both evangelistic and promotional programs at Washington and instructed the cooperative committee on evangelism to confer with the Board of Missionary Cooperation. The adjustment of these programs for the year, in order to give evangelism an adequate opportunity for its great message, was reached at a meeting of the cooperative committee on evangelism and the administrative committee of the Board of Missionary Cooperation held June 30.

It was mutually agreed that the cooperative committee on evangelism shall have the right to carry on an intensive and continuous evangelistic campaign for the entire six months. The Board of Missionary Cooperation immediately called off all its public conferences for the six months' period and has refrained from arranging meetings with groups of churches during that time.

It was also mutually agreed that the Board of Missionary Cooperation shall have the right during January and February to carry out its proposed plan for broadcasting missionary information and securing the adoption by the individual churches of its quota for the budget for 1927 and 1928. This agreement is not to be interpreted as interfering with cities or states holding such public meetings as they may initiate.

This statement is made to prevent any possible misunderstanding regarding the apparent overlapping of the evangelistic and promotional activities.

Let every church begin immediately, that is, during October, its efforts for winning souls, and give itself wholeheartedly to this great kingdom task; and let every church in January and February prayerfully and sacrificially consecrate its spiritual and financial resources to adequately provide for the kingdom enterprise.

—FRANK A. SMITH, chairman, cooperative committee on evangelism.

is involved in the question. In regard to the rural church in particular, what is to be done to supply a minister for such a place? What stamp of man is needed? How shall he be prepared? How shall he be supported? How can he be kept "fit" intellectually and spiritually? The summer Bible school answers these questions in part. It is by no means sufficient for the whole solution; but it renders a valuable aid to the ultimate answer. Part of the question deals with finances. The university has no money for this work. There should be an endowment raised from which the expenses of the school can be met. We must wait many decades before the Christian constituency in China will be willing or able to provide this fund. Is there in America a man or woman who will give the necessary money to make this school a permanent factor in our campaign for the rural community, and to enable us to improve it so it may more adequately serve its purpose?

Deplorable Deeds

While we have been up here, news has reached us of the foul murder of Mr. Wang, the social service worker at the Chengtu Baptist church. He, with his son and brother, went out to buy a vase which he thought he could sell at a profit. He had $40 which he had borrowed for the deal. When he reached the stall where the vase was for sale, he proceeded to bargain for it and exposed his money. Some soldiers saw the coins. Mr. Wang did not conclude the bargain and went toward home. The soldiers followed him and finally accosted him, saying that their officer had sent them to bring Mr. Wang to him. Mr. Wang, perhaps fearing to refuse to go, accompanied them. They led him to a lonely place among some graves outside the east gate of the city, attacked him, strangled him with a turban, and made off with the $40. Later he was found dead. Mr. Fay, pastor of the Chengtu church, wrote to the city officials about the deed but has received no reply, and does not think that one will be made. He says that such acts on the part of the soldiers are too common to secure the attention of the authorities.

In a recent letter I told of the dastardly murder of a woman missionary in broad daylight on one of the streets of Chengtu. Now comes the slaying of an inoffensive Christian man by the very people who are supposed to exist for the protection of the populace. It is all symptomatic of the unsafe conditions. There is a feeling of dread uncertainty among the people, born of just such acts as the one I have related. The country groans under the heel of an irresponsible military group. Nothing will change the condition of affairs until that same military leadership is repudiated by the Chinese people and swept from the country. Ideal constitutions, western systems of law, ill-adapted to the needs of this people, abrogation of extrajurisdiction and customs autonomy are mere nostrums. The enemies of China are of her own household. The country needs cleansing from within. Meantime the summer Bible training school and similar forces are at work preparing the day of salvation. At bottom, all China's problems are essentially spiritual; the best solution for them is the reign of God in the hearts of her citizens. That is why I am in China.

Cortland Association, New York

By G. A. FAIRBANK

THE churches at Pitcher and Cincinnatus were fortunate in securing Rev. Walter B. McNinch as pastor soon after Rev. Alfred Dence left the field. Mr. Dence preached his last sermon there Aug. 15 and Doctor McNinch preached his first sermon as pastor Sept. 5. This was brought about by the assistance of General Director Colebrook of the state convention, thus weeks or months of pastorless churches were avoided.

Doctor McNinch comes from the district directorship; previous to that he was associational missionary, serving the state convention for ten years. He will find the churches on his field in good condition as his predecessor, Mr. Dence, who left to enter the Northern Baptist Theological seminary at Chicago, did fine work there. He was loved and respected not only by the churches which he had served so faithfully but by the community, and his departure was generally regretted. He had served the Cincinnatus church more than two years and the Pitcher church for less than a year. Soon after Rev. G. J. Knepe resigned at Pitcher, the two fields were united on the advice of District Director Abrams. Including Doctor McNinch, six of the thirteen pastors of the association are Rochester men.

The church at Solon has been supplied during the summer by Miss Mabel Stevens. Mr. Arthur Tice who has acted as pastor for six years has not been able to resume preaching since his automobile accident last fall, although he has resumed his duties as rural mail carrier.

A class of four was graduated from the standard teacher training course in the church at McGraw. Rev. C. W. Briggs, director of religious education, preached the sermon and awarded the diplomas. This class was taught by the pastor, Rev. G. A. Fairbank. About a dozen started in but all but these four dropped out.

A union daily vacation Bible school was conducted in the church at McGraw for three weeks; the pastor acted as principal. During the vacation he supplied in the Elmwood Presbyterian church of Syracuse, in the Baptist church of Mexico which, with the village, was observing the centennial of the high school and academy. This was the first church that Mr. Fairbank served after leaving the seminary and he was invited back to preach on that occasion. He supplied the Memorial church of Cortland and the Cincinnatus church in August. Rev. A. H. McKnight of Homer was the supply for the only Sunday that the McGraw church had one during the vacation period; the churches of the village united in the Sunday services. Eight young people from this church attended the W. W. G. house party at Keuka Park.

The work in Marathon is proceeding smoothly under the direction of Rev. Russell Moore. A union daily vacation Bible school was held for two weeks with an enrolment of ninety-nine, representing four churches. Of these, forty-three were Baptists. Mr. Moore was the principal, and seven of the ten teachers were Baptists. Pastors Cutten and McKnight spent an evening with the people of Marathon seeking to arouse enthusiasm for the school before it was opened. Pastor Moore spent a portion of his vacation on Lake Erie.

Rev. W. T. Barnes, pastor of the Summer Hill church, conducted, with his wife's assistance, a vacation Bible school on Saturdays for five or six weeks since this was the only time when the boys and girls who were needed on the farms could attend. This is an entirely rural section.

A combination service of the church and the Bible school was tried with success in Homer during the summer. The service opened at 10:30 and closed at noon. Pastor McKnight supplied during August in the First and Memorial churches of Cortland, the Methodist in Homer, the North church of Camden, N. J., the Calvary of Binghamton, and the McGraw church. The supplies for the Homer church were Rev. J. D. Morrison, Rev. W. H. York of Homer, Mr. James Smith, a layman of Cortland, and Miss Elizabeth Allport, the church missionary of Cuba. The choir took one service and the young people one service.

Pastor McKnight was principal of the union daily vacation Bible school which had a registration of 160, with average attendance of over 100.

The Hands of God

By ARTHUR E. COWLEY

*THE hands of God have beauty rare
I see them paint the flowers fair,
And glorious sunsets with their glow,
And mighty mountains crowned with snow.*

*The hands of God, they are so strong
They sweep the howling winds along,
And in their grasp, the seas they keep,
And dig the caves, broad and deep.*

*The hands of God, they are so kind
To bird and beast and all mankind;
Like velvet old, like angel's wings
They are such soft and gentle things.*

*O hands of God with beauty rare
So strong and yet so kind,
Mould me until the world shall see Thy handiwork in me.*

The Groton church, Rev. Mark Rich, pastor, is making preparation to entertain the association which meets on Sept. 28-29. Rev. G. L. Cutten of Cortland is moderator and Rev. A. H. McKnight, preacher of the opening sermon. The program committee is planning a strong program. Pastor Rich was principal of the union daily vacation Bible school held in Groton.

The fall work in the Memorial church of Cortland, Rev. F. W. Allen, pastor, is opening up well. William Douglass, superintendent of the Sunday school is planning a rally day. The supplies for the church during the vacation of pastor Allen were Rev. L. E. Ford of Salamanca (whose death has just occurred); Rev. S. S. Bradford, a retired clergyman of Cortland; Rev. W. H. York, a retired preacher in Homer; and Rev. G. A. Fairbank of McGraw. Mr. Allen supplied the First church in Cortland for one Sunday and preached once in the Carthage church where he was formerly pastor and where he and Mrs. Allen spent part of the vacation.

Pastor G. L. Cutten of the First church of Cortland received the degree of Th.M. from the Rochester seminary in May. He taught three courses in the Western New York summer school of Christian education at Silver lake, one in the organization and administration of the D. V. B. S., one in the organization and administration of the church school, and one in the supervision of religious education. Mr. Cutten was again principal of the union daily vacation Bible school of Cortland. He is the acknowledged leader in religious education not only in the city of Cortland but also in the county. He is superintendent of the week-day religious instruction in Cortland. Last year there was an enrolment of 450 pupils from the second to the fifth grades.

Three young women from the First church were in the summer school at Silver lake, seven at the house party at Keuka Park, two boys at the young people's assembly in Colgate and one at Cook. Pastor Cutten is scoutmaster of a strong troop of boy scouts which carries on the ambassador program. Nineteen of these boys were in the Y.M.C.A. camp on DeRuyter lake for scout week.

Indianapolis Newsletter

By FREDERIC ARTHUR HAYWARD

IT IS anniversary time in Indianapolis. One hundred years ago in a village of about 1000 inhabitants, surrounded by still smaller villages, the Baptist work began. It is a long step from a village of 1000 to a powerful city of nearly 400,000 people. It is almost impossible to visualize the Baptist work from the log cabin to the Baptist property which is valued at more than $2,000,000. In 1826 the Indianapolis Association was organized with eight churches, only one of which remains intact today. Sept. 21-22, at the Thirty-First Street church this association celebrated this memorable date. A suitable program was carried out and a souvenir booklet released. In time, the historical sketch arranged by Miss Della Dearborn of the First church will be enlarged and the "shorter history" of the individual churches now in cooperation given.

Resignations

After the most enjoyable fellowships and dreads mentioning departures. If God can use a pastor to do great things in the church he leaves, how much greater may be his service in the church to which he goes. Some such philosophy is in our mind. Rev. Paul Judson Morris of Emerson Avenue church goes to Vermont to become the director of religious education. He is well qualified for a successful work and Vermont is to be congratulated.—Rev. Harry R. Baldo leaves the Second church where he has made an heroic effort, to become pastor of Carmel church, Detroit.—Rev. E. Chastian of Garden church has resigned after making a real contribution to this church in the changing industrial zone. He is open for a call and the church which calls him will find a Godly man and a good pastor.—Rev. Albert E. King, our B. Y. P. U. president, has closed his work with the Hillcrest church. This church has been moved from a former location, completely remodelled and reorganized. Mr. King's pastorate has been wonderfully helpful. He is also waiting a call to another church and we can assure any church of his qualifications as a leader and a man of God.

The National Baptist Convention
The earnestness of the National Baptist Convention (negro) has aroused an unusual degree of interest and sympathy among our white pastors. The program, which extends over a week and brings to this city more than 2000 ministers and workers, is a comprehensive one. The list of speakers includes outstanding leaders in civic, educational, and religious circles. We greet our brethren and wish God's greatest blessing on them and their growing plans.

The Fall Program

The city work starts off with zeal. Already evidences point to a successful fall and winter's work. The spirit of evangelism is in the foreground.

The Iowa Assembly

By I. J. BRAME

THE Iowa Assembly held at Iowa Falls, July 20-Aug. 1, was the most successful in the history of that gathering. The enrolment of nearly 3000 broke all previous records; students were registered from Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, New Jersey, Michigan, New York, Illinois, California, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

The faculty, larger this year than ever before, offered an unusual variety of courses. In addition to local instructors, the staff included: Dr. William Gear Spencer, president of Hillsdale college, Michigan; Miss Nellie M. Dunham, Baptist state director of children's work, Ohio; Mrs. Elizabeth M. Finn, director of young people's work, A. B. P. S.; Dr. R. E. Gaines, instructor Richmond university, Virginia; Dr. G. A. Huntley, Shanghai college, China; Mrs. Mary M. Kinney, Americanization secretary, W. A. B. H. M. S.; Dr. Howard Chapman, student pastor, university of Michigan; Miss Grace Witham, Mounds Park sanitarium, St. Paul, Minn.; Rev. C. A. Carman, Galesburg, Ill. Dean Raymond N. Carr had charge of the music again this year, and on "music" night directed an impressive production of the oratorio, "Elijah." Assembly classes were held during the morning while the afternoons were given to recreation.

A department of publicity was created this year with the writer as director. A two-page mimeograph paper was published daily during the assembly and distributed at the close of the evening service.

Two features of the assembly program were especially appealing, the sunset meditations and the "good night" meetings. At 6:50 each evening in favorable weather, every one gathered on the banks of the Iowa river for sunset meditations; in inclement weather they were held in the old pavilion. Dr. Howland Hanson led these the first week, Rev. Lewis Jacobsen, the second. The "good night" meeting conducted every evening by "Charlie" Carman closed each day's program. One of the most interesting things about these meetings was the way in which the young people made the shift from the pep meeting with which each began to the religious service with which it closed.

As part of this year's assembly program a new auditorium, which has a seating capacity of 1800, was dedicated. The indebtedness of $4800 was entirely paid before the dedication ceremony.

Dr. A. W. Caul was elected president of the assembly for another year and Rev. Victor N. Witter was elected chancellor.

Iowa Letter

Annual Association.

IOWA has twenty-one Baptist associations. Five of these hold their annual meetings in June, four in August, ten in September, and two in October. Thus far the attendance has been good and a fine spirit has prevailed in the sessions. Many baptisms have been reported and plans for the coming year are encouraging. The suggestion from the Northern Baptist Convention for six months of devotion to evangelism has been well received and I believe that our pastors generally will lead their churches in this united effort.

New Physical Education Building at Des Moines.

The dream of Dr. Frank E. Foulk is rapidly being realized on the campus of Des Moines university. The new physical education building, near the athletic field, is approximately 130 by 87 feet, and fifty-two feet high; 110,000 ornamental bricks will be used in the arch while 320,000 more are required to complete the building; 1800 people can be seated and 400 more can stand in the spectators' room. Adequate rooms will be provided for both men and women for the various physical education exercises. In some of its appointments the new hall will be the best west of the Mississippi river. The total cost will be $125,000. That equipment may be complete in all respects, a few thousand dollars more than has been subscribed will be needed. Some Des Moines university student or friend of any one of the schools of the university may be glad to send a contribution to Dr. Frank E. Foulk, Bankers' Trust building, Des Moines, Iowa, to help in this addition to the equipment of the university.

Prof. Charles J. Robinson is the new dean of the college of arts and sciences. Eight new instructors are on the staff; one comes from the University of Chicago, one from the University of Wisconsin, one from Kansas City university, and one from the University of Iowa. Mrs. Phyllis Spencer will be the dean of women.

Iowa Baptist Convention.

Dr. G. P. Mitchell closes his work as executive secretary of the convention this month. He has served Iowa Baptists in this capacity for fourteen years and has done a constructive work with the churches and with our institutions of learning. The state is doing far more in caring for our Baptist young people in the state schools than it did a decade ago. Doctor Mitchell also has hearty sympathy for the struggling churches and for the pastors who serve them. He has made warm friends in Iowa and in the Northern Baptist Convention. Dr. and Mrs. Mitchell have rented their house to Dr. Frank I. Anderson. They plan to go to Los Angeles and elsewhere in Southern California for the fall and winter, returning to Iowa the first of next May. Best wishes from their many friends will go with them.

The board of managers of the convention has secured Dr. Frank I. Anderson of Ilion, N. Y., as executive secretary and he is now in Des Moines. He is a stranger here but comes highly recommended from a church of 700 members which he served for three years. He will have an opportunity to attend several of our larger associations and will receive a hearty welcome.

Sept. 10 the board of managers had a special session to hear the report of Doctor Mitchell and to welcome Doctor Anderson to the new field. There was animated discussion on the question of the rural church. The auto and the radio are the disturbing factors in the rural community; fine music and an eloquent preacher challenge the attention of the farmer as well as the man in the city. Mr. Frank Sage of Washington made an appeal for the country church. Doctor Anderson said that when the subject was discussed in New York, it was noted that many of our greatest preachers came from the rural churches. Mr. Sage declared that our churches ought to wake up and do vastly more for the neglected, unsaved people around them. He told of a Bohemian community which has left the Roman Catholic church but no Protestants are striving to reach them with the gospel.

Pastor W. R. Yard of Marshalltown called attention to an incident cited at the Iowa Baptist Assembly by Doctor Gaines of Richmond, Va. A church after dragging along several years at a dying rate, finally voted to disband and reorganize. Only those who were willing to support the full program of the church were accepted for membership. A committee labored with any who were indifferent to missions or any other part

Your King and Country Need You

THIS old rallying call was never more in order than at this moment in the United States.

As Christian women, your King, the Lord Jesus Christ, needs you. As American women, your country calls you to immediate action. The situation is the most serious since the civil war in 1861. Those opposed to the eighteenth amendment to the constitution—powerful interests with large sums of money for propaganda, and with the support of the press—propose to undo the work accomplished through the prayers and efforts of Christian people during the past fifty years.

Because we have been asleep, thinking that the old fight against the saloon was settled, the enemy has won strategic points and is determined by fair means or foul to defeat prohibition. An immense amount of false testimony has been turned in. Clever attempts through tricky referenda in the hands of our opponents will be successful unless we are on guard. We entreat you, Christian women, who hold the balance of power in this coming election, to register and vote at primaries and polls. We are powerless before the giant evil with the human means at our command, but with God's help we can win the victory. It is a crusade and we must lay down unimportant things, personal matters, and work quickly and pray earnestly to save our constitution and defend this cause which is vital to the welfare of future generations.

It is not surprising that in six years we have not enforced the law thoroughly. An old, entrenched evil is not conquered easily. In the old days they sang at temperance meetings a pathetic song to a drunken father in the saloon, "Father, dear father, come home with me now." We do not longer need to appeal to a drunken father. Our new version is "Mother, dear mother, come down to the polls."

Study the situation, not through the daily press, but through the best authorities on the right side in the country, go to the primaries to select men who will keep their oath of office, and to the polls to elect those men worthy to represent Christian people rather than corrupt politicians.

The woman's national committee for law enforcement has literature and plans, and can give you information regarding your state organizations where you will get accurate information.

of the program. If these people would not respond, after prayer and labor, they were dismissed. The growth in the church in ten years was phenomenal. We pet and coax men too much; we ought to deliver the full gospel of Jesus Christ.

Dr. and Mrs. J. A. Curtis, our missionaries from Donacoda, have been a benediction throughout Iowa in their rest year — if traveling almost constantly among the churches can be called rest. Mrs. Curtis' health would not permit her to travel much, but Doctor Curtis has given a full year in home service. Iowa B. P. Y. U. S. plan to provide a car for Dr. and Mrs. Curtis and expect friends in the churches to help in this undertaking. The missionaries can do much more work every week, visiting churches scattered over a large area, if they have a good automobile.

Both our director of religious education, Victor N. Witter, and Mrs. Witter have undergone serious operations at Rochester, Minn., but both are rapidly recovering. Mr. Witter has done a strong year's work and is highly esteemed by young and old throughout the state.

Central Conference of German Baptist Churches

By BENJAMIN SCHLIPP

AUG. 24-29 the clans representing the Central Conference of German Baptist Churches gathered at St. Joseph, Mich. The conference comprises the thirty-two churches in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Michigan with 6173 members. Abundant hospitality on the part of the entertaining church and a spirit of Christian love made our fellowship during these days one long to be remembered.

Statistics are regarded sometimes as dry, but they do enlighten regarding the outward progress the denomination has made. Last year our conference had a net gain of 164 members. There were 193 baptisms, of which 57 per cent was from the Sunday schools, which reported an increase of 229 pupils and a total enrollment of 5871 with contributions of $22,621 for all causes. Total contributions from the churches were $231,032, equal to $37.50 per member. This shows that giving is not a forgotten virtue in our churches. Whether our gifts measure up to our obligation and are a true index of our heartfelt gratitude to God is another question. A 20 per cent increase in gifts for missions and benevolence was recommended to the churches. An increase in membership and contributions was reported by the ladies' missionary union and the B. Y. P. U.

Within the limits of a short report, not all the good things that were said can be retold. The opening sermon was by Rev. A. Bredy of Detroit on "The Cloud of Witnesses" (Heb. 12:1). "We have often seen clouds before the sun in the evening and wondered at the beauty of their coloring," he said. "A cloud is made up of mist from the earth. All its beauty comes from the rays of the sun shining through. So are we earth-born and any beauty we may possess comes from the Sun of Righteousness. We are a cloud of witnesses." This latter thought was stressed in the body of the sermon, and those heroic witnesses mentioned in chapter eleven were recalled, as well as many more modern ones.

The mission sermon was preached by Rev. G. Schwandt of Chicago on the words, "Thy kingdom come." The idea was brought out that the kingdom is spiritual and our duty is to do what we can by consecration of ourselves and our possessions to make its coming possible.

The doctrinal sermon was by Rev. I. C. Baum of Chicago on "The Cross and the Sinner" (Eph. 1:7). The fact of forgiveness and the means and source of it were treated in an inspiring manner.

Other addresses were by Rev. H. Sellhorn of Lansing, Mich., on "The Family Altar"; Rev. Wm. Kuhn, Chicago, on "Lukewarmness," and "They Could Not Help"; Rev. C. F. Zummach, Kankakee, Ill., "The Coordination of Work in the Church"; Rev. C. F. Lehr, Cleveland, Ohio, "The Denominational Consciousness"; Rev. Benj. Graf, Detroit, "The Divine Source of the Church."

At the inspiring B. P. Y. U. rallies, Rev. Theo. Dons of Cleveland spoke on "The Telling Life"; Prof. F. W. C. Meyer of Rochester Theological seminary on "Give Me This Mountain," and "Adorning the Doctrine."

The ladies' missionary union held its session on Friday afternoon. Dr. Hattie Schwendener spoke on the work of the children's home in St. Joseph and Mrs. H. F. Smith, a missionary on furlough from Burma, gave an address on the work which she and her husband are doing there.

Here, There and Everywhere

LEWIS CLASS FOR MEN at Galesburg, Ill., has set the goal of 100 for rally day, Sept. 26.

MRS. K. W. BROWN of Ames, Iowa, will leave soon for a visit to her daughter, who is an instructor in Shanghai Baptist college, China.

FIRST CHURCH, Madison, Ind., passed resolutions declaring itself opposed to "open, associate or unimmersed membership." Ryker's Ridge church commended the action of the Northern Baptist Convention in limiting membership to immersed believers, but "deplores the failure of the convention to define its constituency as consisting solely of those Baptists churches which require baptism by immersion as a prerequisite to church membership."

A WEDDING COMPLEX struck the parsonage of Maywood church, Chicago, recently. First, Miss Mary Favoright, daughter of the pastor, was married to Rev. M. Ray McKay of St. Louis. Later, Pastor and Mrs. R. B. Favoright celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their own marriage. Rather, perhaps, the good people did it for them in the way of a surprise party.

PASTOR WM. B. PERCIVAL has resigned at Mesa, Ariz.

REV. CARY B. TOOMS has accepted a position as teacher in the Baptist seminary at Saltillo, Mex.

REV. C. C. CLARK goes from Newark, N. J., to the pastorate at Globe, Ariz.

MR. BERT RABORN, who has been assistant to Pastor J. B. Lawrence at Shawnee, Okla., has resigned to go into business with his father.

DR. FREDERICK M. WHITE, pastor at Centerville, Mich., is making his pulpit count for practical Christianity. He puts health talks in his church bulletins, and discusses economic and industrial problems.

DR. A. W. BEAVEN of Lake Avenue church, Rochester, returned from his vacation Sept. 1 to begin the eighteenth year of his ministry with this church. Rev. W. S. K. Yeaple, Mrs. J. C. Carman and other workers kept the work going in good shape during the summer, and the financial receipts paid all bills.

THE HAMBURG CHURCH, New Jersey, under the leadership of its pastor, Rev. Martin Brynildsen, has completed a building program which completely equips this church for its varied activities. The Sunday school is helped in its departmental work by the new addition and extra classrooms. The church and Sunday-school rooms have been redecorated, and the church and parsonage painted. The church tower, struck by lightning, required complete replacement. The ladies' aid supplied part of the new velvet carpet. New oak floors have been laid, platforms rebuilt, new pews and a pipe organ installed. The plan the pastor has adopted for the church will pay for all these improvements within from three to four years.

JOHN MIEROP, formerly a member of the Prospect Park church of Paterson, N. J., has been called to the Newton church as its pastor. July 13 he was ordained in the Prospect Park church, Rev. Albert Demott of Hackensack Calvary church, preaching the ordination sermon. July 23 the installation service was held at his charge in Newton. Rev. O. Barchivitz gave the charge to the candidate, Rev. M. Brynildsen, clerk, the charge to the church, and Rev. J. L. K. MacLeod brought associational greetings.

DR. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS preached at the Madison Avenue church, New York, during August. Dr. George Caleb Moor, the pastor, welcomed fifty new members during the summer.

REV. PAUL JUDSON MORRIS, after serving the Emerson Avenue church of Indianapolis for five years, has resigned to become director of religious education and evangelism for the Vermont state convention. Mr. Morris succeeded his father, the late Wm. E. Morris, in the pastorate of the Emerson Avenue church. In the five years 388 people have united with the church, making an increase in the membership from 165 in 1921 to the present membership of 432. During this time, the church has completed two sections of a proposed four-unit plant, making an investment of $60,000 in the present buildings and equipment. Mr. Morris will close his work in Indianapolis Oct. 1 and take up his new duties in Vermont. The family will reside in Burlington, Vt.

EVANGELIST ELMER C. MILLER of South Bend, Ind., has closed a revival at Norborne, Mo., with nine churches cooperating in a large tabernacle which proved too small at the close. There were many confessions and reclamations and on the closing Sunday a large number of young people volunteered for life service in the ministry and missions.

AFTER A HAPPY and successful pastorate in Pasadena covering a period of fifteen years, Rev. B. B. Jacques has accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the Fairmount Avenue church of San Diego, Calif. This church is located in the eastern section of the city surrounded by 25,000 people, and growing fast. A Sunday-school unit of a new building has been erected and is now occupied. An auditorium will be added later.

REV. AMBROSE M. BAILEY, pastor of the First church, Seattle, has returned with his family from vacation spent on the San Juan Islands. The pulpit supplies during his absence were Rev. J. Whitcomb Brougher and his son James, and Rev. J. E. Dillard of Birmingham, Ala. The auditorium has been filled at every summer service. Bustard to assist in a series of meetings in February.

REV. SETH JACOBSON, who came from Sweden a year ago to attend the Bethel institute in St. Paul, after having completed the course in the Bethel Theological seminary in Stockholm, has been serving the church in Ramsey, S. D., this summer. He has made a special study of the English language and has made such progress that he is able to preach in the English language every Sunday night.

REV. J. FREDERIC CATLIN began his ninth year as pastor of First church, Council Bluffs, Iowa, Sept. 1. During the past seven years the church has paid on an average $9000 per year on its building program. While doing this it has increased its benevolences 140 per cent over its previous record. The average attendance of the church school has increased 80 per cent and the church membership has increased from 354 to 624.

This shows a total net gain in annual giving for denominational purposes of $3,200,000, or more than $2 per capita.

THREE CENTURIES ~ OF ~ ORGAN BUILDING

LIKE tiny heart-beats—magnets transmit the life-throb of an organ. None is good enough for a Kilgen excepting those that we make ourselves. Hundreds of these magnets go into each great Kilgen—each a superbly perfect unit. Failure of a magnet would be total failure under Kilgen ideals. So they, like all else, are slowly, carefully, thoroughly built by hand—a personal skill contributing what rapid-fire machines could not.

Of cold-rolled brass, the bases and shells are made. This exclusive Kilgen advantage entails greater cost but makes far more durable and trustworthy magnets. Another reason why a Kilgen gives service which must be measured by decades.

Kilgen organ architects have designed impressive instruments for scores of Baptist churches. They will be glad to give you the benefit of their experience. Write to Dept. E.

Obituary

Mrs. Minnie Alice Hedeon, wife of Rev. Nelson Hedeon, died Sept. 5, 1926, in North Ellsworth, Me. She was born in Ellsworth, Me., Nov. 23, 1862; married to Mr. Hedeon, Oct. 24, 1883, moving to Manchester, N. H. She was baptized by Doctor Kimball in 1885, uniting with Manchester Baptist church. 1886 she began missionary work for People's church. 1896, Mr. and Mrs. Hedeon entered Swedish American mission work in Montclair, N. J. They served in Brooklyn, N. Y.; in Portland, Me.; in Lowell, Mass.; a second term in Montclair where Mrs. Hedeon's health failed in 1915. She rallied but in 1922 ill health forced her return from service in Bridgeport, Conn., to Ellsworth where she lived until her death. Memorial services were held in North Ellsworth church. Rev. L. G. Perry, Ellsworth Baptist church, and Rev. Mr. Besant, Ellsworth Falls Congregational church, officiated.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel building, Chicago.

"Let us read you what a man from Michigan wrote the other day. He lives at Bay City. 'Enclosed find check for $2.50 for another year's subscription. One copy of THE BAPTIST, properly read, has more value than the whole year's price. God bless you in the work.' It was signed by P. E. Phillips.

"Can you beat it? One copy worth more than $2.50. How much more? Well, let us say 1 cent more. That would be $2.51. There are fifty-two copies per year. That would be $130.52. How we claim that this is a good investment. What is the paper worth to you?

"And listen to what this man from Ohio says: 'Surely I want THE BAPTIST. Got to keep track of how conservative or how progressive I should be to be a good Baptist.' This cheerful renewal is from Gordon S. Broholm of Columbus. You can't keep a good man down. He counts the investment worth while too.

"And aren't we always glad to hear from the grandfathers and grandmothers who have been reading the paper and letting their light shine through all the years? Listen to this inspiring missive: 'Am enclosing $2.50 in payment for THE BAPTIST for the coming year—probably my last subscription as I am in my ninety-third year. Have taken it through all its various names, beginning before it was in pamphlet form at all.' This from Mrs. William Farr, Nashua, Iowa.

"Let us pause here a minute. Let us all say a word of prayer to the heavenly Father for this faithful pilgrim who has covered almost a century. We can never measure the value of these beautiful mothers and fathers. And if there is still spared to us the great joy and blessing of a mother who gave us so much and asked for so little in return, may we gladden her years with expressions of our constant love. And if she would enjoy the denominational paper and does not have it, may we send it to her at once with our best wishes.

"A pastor from out West came in smiling the other day. He said he had been working on a man for a year and finally had persuaded him to take THE BAPTIST. The pastor and one deacon took it and now the new man made three, a gain of 50 per cent. We learned that he had about 300 families in his parish. We figured a little; one year, one new subscription, total 3. Families destitute of religious paper, 297. Present year of grace—1926. Time required at one year per family to supply all with THE BAPTIST—297 years; or job completed in 2223 A. D. Shades of Methusaleh! Even some 50 per cent gains represent awful losses.

"The telephone rang the other day. 'Hello. Yes, this is the office of THE BAPTIST. Yes. Oh, this is Downers Grove. Yes. No, we haven't received it yet. Yes. Fine. We should be glad to get it. Yes. Many thanks and much appreciation. God bless you. Goodbye. What's that? Yes. Surely. $2 rate when the list represents 10 per cent of the resident membership. Yes, that's right. So long.' It was Downers Grove, Ill., calling to let us know the list of new subscriptions to make up a 10 per cent list for its church would reach us that week. Congratulations, Downers Grove. Hats off to you.

"The orator had reached the climax and he said dramatically, 'Again I ask, what should every man do when he hears the still, small voice?' Wag in the gallery: 'Get up and walk the floor with the kid.' Which reminds us that the frost is on the pumpkin and the fodder's in the shock. It is autumn and time to renew those lists of subscriptions that you had resolved to look after as soon as you returned from vacation. Well, the voice is calling. It is up to you to walk. Get busy. Do it now. Thank you.

"WCOY now signs off. Procrastination is the thief of time. Swat him."

REV. G. E. HARRIS has resigned the pastorate of Calvary church, Kansas City, Mo., and will take charge of the First church, Billings, Mont. Dr. John F. Vines of Roanoke has received a call to Calvary church. It awaits his reply.

DR. BERNARD CLAUSEN having spent the summer vacation touring the Pacific coast, gave the result of his observations in a sermon to his people at Syracuse, N. Y., Sept. 5, on "The United States of Religion."

MRS. FREDERICK W. HEATH of Second church, Chicago, died Sept. 14. She and her husband have been for a generation among the most active members of the church, she being a deaconess and he deacon and financial secretary of the church.

THE DATE OF MEETING of the Iowa Baptist Convention has been changed from Oct. 27-31 to Oct. 20-24, at Waterloo.

FIRST CHURCH, Des Moines, Iowa, sets a goal of 700 for its Sunday school before the New Year.

WEDDING BELLS ARE heard from Portland, Ore., where Dr. James Whitcomb Brougher solemnized the marriage of Miss Helen Ball of that city to his son, Rev. James Whitcomb Brougher, Jr., Sept. 16.

An erratum should be noted. In giving the list of members of the Chicago committee of arrangements for the next meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention, "Mrs. M. V. Parks" was named as a member. There was a mistake in the name. The member whose name was intended is Mrs. Charles H. Parkes.

"Law, not War" is the subject of an editorial in the New England Homestead (Springfield, Mass.) which says: "The deeper you go into this whole subject, the plainer becomes the folly of war. Except in the rarest circumstances, warfare is without justification and always is destructive of human rights." In another statement: "Pregnant with vast possibilities of weal or woe to all, is the international disarmament conference now on at Geneva. . . . As nations disarm, the chances of war decrease."

"White savagery" is what Lucia Ames Mead calls it in Zion's Herald, and she describes it in this fashion: "Is nudity wrong? Not so far as it is necessary for comfort, or for work, as in a swimming race. But self-conscious, purposeful display of every line of the body for purpose of allurements and audacious breaking of conventions is another matter. A certain vaudeville theater advertises girls in bathing suits in the foyer, who have shapely figures and who will give away bathing suits to patrons. Possibly they are not as soul-stained as prostitutes, but they are playing with fire and they know it. They receive pay for offering temptation to every young man." How much good such plain talk will do remains to be seen.

It is time to call out the whole body of the trained malicious, thinks the Western Christian Advocate. Speaking of prophets, it remarks: "It is about time for the Christian world openly to attack Sherwood Eddy. He has risen to the level of a world prophet, and has gone out so far in his insight and spiritual message that he should draw fire from his own ranks. This is the fate of every radical apostle of Jesus Christ. When he starts upward and begins to see things in their real relation and significance, men applaud him. He goes forward and outward until he stands midway between the two camps. Both sides come to claim him. If he remains independent and refuses to enter one or to go back to the other, but seeks to bring his original crowd over to himself, then he begins to receive the fire from both sides. Sherwood Eddy, marvelous advocate of the social teaching of Jesus, and matchless Christian statesman, is now in Russia. He is saying things that startle the conservatives in this country. Men are beginning to rise up in protest. It is time for them to turn their guns on him. He will be excluded from the fellowship if they have their way. They will treat him to a solution of idiomatic traduction. They will seek to leave him as a worn-out voice that has spent itself, and reject him as one who went too far and was engulfed by his radicalism."

story told simply and charmingly—Russell H. Conwell could always tell of the miracle of the blind man at the Pool of Siloam, which takes the reader into the home-life of the people among whom Jesus walked and with whom he talked. The climax comes in the confession of faith in the Christ the part of the man who was healed. The story was published first in 1892 under the title of "Little Boy," but has long been out of print. This little book new because so old—will be welcomed by the many who are collecting the late author Conwell's writings.

Believing World, by Lewis Browne. New York: MacMillan. $3.50.

essentially, here is a study in comparative religion; but on this subject no such book ever was written before, and probably never will be written hereafter. One thing, it is in the form of an interesting story that holds the reader's interest. A grade school pupil can read with enjoyment. There are the finest illustrations drawn by the author; nobody else could have produced them. Some of them are luminous, others odd. Evolution is the working idea, conceived somewhat after the fashion of H. G. Wells, to whom the book is dedicated. But after tracing the origin of religion from primitive fear, through the various stages of magic, animism, and animism, the author turns about and tells the reader that it is all guesswork and that one guess is almost as good as another concerning the origin of religion. Thence through ancient pagan and mystery religions the story runs with more confidence. Finally, the great living faiths are taken one by one. Christianity is one of them, with a modernistic explanation given with eloquent appreciation. Indeed it is said in italics that Jesus literally came from the dead. Christianity, of Peter Paul's day or ours is not the sole religion of Jesus. It borrowed its right and left, from the mystery cults, from pagan customs, from secular society. It never lost Jesus, and it has carried to mankind his message of salvation. The reader will find fault with the book, but will hardly be able to lay down. And it will stir up his thinking.

Stewardship in the Life of Youth, by Herbert Donald Williamson and Helen Kingsbury Wallace. New York: Revell.

one of the most wholesome books which it has ever been the writer's privilege to review. It is probably a series of addresses which the two authors have delivered as field specialists to the Board of Missionary Cooperation of the Northern Baptist Convention, but it is fortunate for the denomination that they have put these addresses into book form. As a course on stewardship it will be worth a fortune to any young person who gives it careful reading and it will be worth much to the pastor of any church who can persuade a number of his young people to take such a course.

The study is with the larger view of stewardship, laying emphasis primarily upon the fact that all of the resources of the Christian are to be given to Christ as an expression of gratitude to the Christ who has given all for us; that this service is to be unselfish, and that its very unselfish purpose puts us in fellowship with Jesus Christ and makes it possible for us, in such union, to have a fellowship with him impossible otherwise. The writers call attention to the resources of youth. They emphasize the need of the surrender of self and this emphasis is based upon the surrender of the will of the individual to the Son of God. They stress the tremendous potency of personality and the fact that time and talent are primary parts of the stewardship of life. One of the most significant chapters is that which discusses planning a life. The authors urgently remind the young people that there is danger in not planning one's life, that there are many unguarded hours for those who do not plan.

The closing chapter, on finding the will of God, is worthy of the perusal of young people, for one of the most serious problems which every person faces is that of learning what God wants him to do.

The summary of the book is that the young Christian is Christ's partner. He has many resources that Christ can use. It is his responsibility to develop them. He must have a life plan, and must fit his life into God's great purpose.

The Brightening Cloud

By Russell H. Conwell

Charmingly written in Doctor Conwell's most pleasing style, this narrative of the circumstances surrounding one of Christ's miracles carries the reader back into the home-life of the people among whom Christ lived.

In vivid word-pictures we see the victim of blindness as a boy, and later a man, in the role of a beggar, then the wonderful miracle of healing, and finally we hear the man's confession of faith in the Great Healer.

Before the Dawn, by Toyohiko Kagawa. New York: Doran. $2.50 net.

A novel of passionate belief in life by the outstanding authority on social subjects in Japan. The author takes his hero from a college life to complete participation in the life of the Kobe slums as a social worker, reformer and missionary of the Christian religion. He shows how Jesus is winning his way into this sodden mass through foreign missionaries and native workers and portrays the unspeakable conditions of pagan life in which brotherhood and social justice are emerging.

The Apocrypha in the Revised Version. New York: Oxford University Press, American Branch. 80 cents.

There are few more valuable commentaries on the modern Bible than the Apocrypha, as the books culled from the canon of the Old Testament are commonly called. (It is well for the lay reader to remember that there are also apocryphal books for the New Testament, but "The Apocrypha" does not contain them.) Even a hasty rereading of its fourteen books keeps one's mind busy pondering the grounds for their elimination from the canon and drawing comparisons between passages. For instance, compare the account of creation in II Esdras 6 with the accounts in Genesis 1 and 2, and compare Wisdom of Solomon 13 with Paul's arraignment of idolaters in Romans 1:18 and following. The reading of the Apocrypha even without commentaries cannot help but yield new insight into the subject and sense of the canonical scriptures. The Oxford Press has done a service in making this valuable work accessible in a volume of "The World's Classics."

The Saving Sense

They had taken a wrong turn in their expensive new car and were lost. They watched for signs and in between he wondered just where he was going to dig up enough to pay the next installment on the car.

"We just passed a sign," she said at last.

"I'll go back and look at it," he said.

He jumped out and went back to read the sign. When he returned she asked, "Are we much off the track?"

"Not at all," he answered. "Quite by accident we seem to have struck the right trail. That sign said, 'To the Poorhouse.'"

"I'm so ill," said the sea-sick passenger, "that the only thing that keeps me alive is the thought of dying."

It was during the war that a militant spinster saw a young man milking a cow. Determined to know why he was not doing his duty patriotically, she went to him and asked: "Why are you not at the front, young man?"

"Well, you see, ma'am," stammered the young man, "there ain't no milk at that end."

There are times when a hint may be a whole ton of bricks. For instance this from the Methodist Recorder:

Scene: Wesley chapel. Occasion: The prayer meeting after the first evening service conducted by the new minister. Extract from the prayer of Bethany Smith: "Lord, we do not know whether our new minister can take a hint, but thou knowest that our last minister was not much of a visitor."

"Well, little light," said the carriage horse to the candle, "I guess we represent the powers that used to be!"—Life.

"I don't doubt that I am much better," said the patient to his physician. "But I am so listless. I seem to need something to stir me up."

"Perhaps I'd better send my bill tomorrow, sir," said the doctor.

"Mother, I wish Harry wouldn't be so polite and always offer me the apples first," complained Mary.

"But that's what he should do," said her mother.

"No, not every time, because I've got to be polite too and then I have to take the little one. Sometimes he could be impolite enough to be polite enough to take the little one first and just give me the big one," reasoned Mary.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for October 3

ISRAEL JOURNEYING TOWARD CANAAN

Lesson Text: Num. 10:11-36. Golden Text: Num. 10:29

Fourteen months after an undisciplined rabble left Egypt Moses had organized that rabble into an orderly host and it was ready to fold its tents and march toward the unknown but promised land

The Cloud

The signal for this departure from Sinai was the lifting of the cloud which had hung over the tabernacle while the process of organizing the tribes into orderly groups went on. We do not know what the cloud was or what caused it. But to the people and to Moses it symbolized the divine presence and held within its shadow the secret of what we call providence. It was doubtless some natural phenomenon charged with significant meaning for a people who sought signs of special guidance from their God. The pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night are highly poetic ideas which take their place alongside the rich imagery of the psalmist who saw the sun as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber. But whatever these phenomena were, they spelled guidance for the Israelites through a bleak and inhospitable country. While science has brought with it great gain in knowledge and freed men from superstition and the spell of magic, the gain has not been without some loss. The loss is seen in the tendency of science to reduce everything in heaven and earth to mere naturalism and thereby to rob the cloud of its religious significance. Happy are the people who still see the hand of God in human events and the beauty of God in all that he has made. We need the cloud of God's providential presence to hang above our social institutions whether church, or home or market place, and to watch it rise as the call to progress.

The Companion

Clouds need to be supplemented by human companionship. Moses appreciated the cloud and doubtless saw it as a symbol of the divine presence, but he also appreciated human companionship, especially when the one he sought as a companion and guide was a man of rich experience, endowed with an extraordinary fund of common sense. Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, was such a man. When he announced his intention of going home to his own kindred, Moses, anxious to hold him, proposed that he accompany them on their journey toward the promised land. It is interesting to note the appeal to Hobab. It is based upon cooperation. Hobab is to help and to be helped. But the point of the story is that divine and human agencies work together in the guidance of God's people through the wilderness. This is a parable of life. If the guidance is all human it may be strictly scientific but incomplete; if it is all religious it may be supernatural, but fanatical. It takes both the cloud and Hobab to form a team which unerringly leads the people forward.

News Notes

BAPTIST SCHOOLS at Bacolod, Philippine Islands, are reported full to overflowing. Forty-nine students were baptized at Himamaylan last year. At La Carlota, 1000 listened to the gospel and a church was organized.

ILOILO BAPTIST MISSION hospital under the superintendence of Dr. R. C. Thomas closed the last year with a cash balance of pesos 8651.93.

IN A STUDENT CONFERENCE at Renfroville, Iloilo, lasting two days, a number of the students were converted to Christ.

FIVE STUDENTS are enrolled this year in the theological department of Central Philippine college.

HEAR THIS BOAST of Rev. Henry W. Munger, San Jose, Antique District, P. I. Inviting visits from other missionaries, he says that he will have to charge visitors a fee for sleeping on the dining table, but will insure freedom from mosquito bites. He says: "It is true I met a weak and anaemic-looking mosquito the other day on the plaza, but I do not know how he got here unless he came over from Iloilo on my running board."

DR. HENRY E. TRALLE and Mr. George Earnest Merrill of the Home Mission Society, have again collaborated in the writing of a book on the planning of church buildings. Their new book is entitled, "Building for Religious Education" and is published by the Century company.

WAS IT VACCINATION? Rev. A. J. Weeks of Moulmein reports: "I am again in a more amiable frame of mind. Got shot in both arms, and still feel a bit sore about such treatment, but it did some execution. My neighbors also seem cheerful. That is another asset."

TURA DISTRICT, ASSAM, has a year's record of 901 baptisms, which brings the total church membership up to 10,284. Of those who were baptized, 406 were pupils in schools. The 150 Sunday schools of the district have an enrolment of 6414, with 285 teachers. The number of mother churches has grown to twenty, with about 236 branch churches.

THE PASSING OF Rev. E. C. Deyo, veteran missionary of the Home Mission Society among the Comanche Indians of Oklahoma, has elicited many tributes of esteem and gratitude from the Indians with whom he labored. The following is of special interest as it was spoken by the first Comanche baptized by Mr. Deyo: "I have known Brother Deyo from the first. I was the first Comanche to be baptized. I never found any fault with him. He always did much for the Indians. He worked hard and led us to know God's word. He preached the word and made the Jesus road plain so that it was easy to follow. He once told the people that some were saying that he was getting old and that he ought to quit and go back to New York to his people. But he said, 'No, God called me to you Comanches and I love the Indians and I shall stay here till God takes me.' And that is just what he did."

The constituency of the Northern Baptist Convention seems to be recovering its lost missionary breath. Receipts for June, 1924, were $239,732; 1925, $206,019; 1926, $279,268.

"It took the strong arm of the law fortified by a great revival of religion to clean up the Elizabethan stage," declares the Baptist and Reflector, "and only the two powers can save us today from the blighting curse of the movies that do pay".

Ohio is going at the matter of promoting international peace in a systematic way. The churches provide for a statewide "Prince of Peace" declamation contest for high school students. The plan is competitive. According to the last report there are 335 entries. Try-outs in the different localities will take place about Armistice day. This is the second year the plan has been in operation.

Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale has made a careful study of prohibition from the point of view of a scientific specialist in sociology and economics. He concludes that the actual consumption of alcohol by drinking, the whole bootlegging enterprise counted in, is today not more than 10 per cent of that before prohibition was enacted. He believes that the law ought not to be weakened, that it ought to be enforced and that its enforcement is practicable.

The Laymen's League of Pennsylvania is an interesting and hopeful movement. It puts its emphasis upon evangelism, upon building up the church and upon religion in the home. Every item is vital and one wishes the effort well. But what will laymen do about the big practical moral problems of the neighborly life, such as race antagonism, the class struggle, poverty, unemployment, national jealousy, recreations, personal rights, gambling, bootlegging, the corrupt use of money in elections, and so on? These problems cannot be solved by returning thanks at the table in a comfortable home where there is plenty to eat and a fairly sure income.

Anthropological research seems to be attended by certain inconveniences or odd conventions. At Galena, Ill., a University of Chicago group dug into a prehistoric burying ground, and found a skeleton. The daily paper thus describes the scene that followed: "Gathered about this ancient man, buried in a flexed position with arms and legs drawn up, and near the black remains of his old fireplace, were the members of the University of Chicago anthropological expedition into the wilds of Illinois, headed by Prof. Fay Cooper-Cole." Is it the usual form for Chicago researchers to be buried in that posture whenever they discover an antique skeleton?

It is announced that the Ku Klux Klan has renounced masks and will make an open political fight for its ideals. This is the true American way. The brave man is willing to stand for his principles openly, and none but brave men can serve America's needs.

In surveying the controversy between the papacy and the government in Mexico, the Christian World, London, concludes that "there is difficulty in sympathizing whole-heartedly with the Catholic church when she cries out against state tyranny. Her habit of political intrigue has gravely weakened her position in such crises as the present."

The American Baptist Home Mission Society voted to remove the office of evangelism from Cleveland to New York Oct. 1. All communications concerning evangelism should be addressed, for the present, to Dr. Herbert F. Stilwell, Room 1006, 23 East 26th st., New York City. The evangelistic policy of the Home Mission Society remains unchanged. The support of state directors of evangelism in cooperation with state conventions will continue. The entire work of the society is essentially evangelistic and this special division will receive constant attention and liberal financial support. Doctor Stilwell will continue to direct the routine of the office until his successor is appointed. It is a tribute to Doctor Stilwell's leadership and consecration that the denomination is at this time so completely committed to its evangelistic task.

From such remote points as Porto Rico and Tasmania come reports of preparations to observe Baptist World Alliance day the first Sunday of next February.

The day of military imperialism is almost done. A marker in the progress of its passing is a commercial air route from Moscow to Kabul. From present signs, a navy will soon be as obsolete as a stage coach, military frontiers will no longer divide nations, and the only wars will be class wars.

Robert B. Eleazer writes in the Baptist Advance (Arkansas), on "Popular Fallacies About Race Relations," one of the most frank, sane, humane and Christian discussions of the subject of all that have come into the office of THE BAPTIST in a long time. The Christian South is in downright earnest in efforts to eliminate that old source of friction.

Southern Baptist editors met at Ridgecrest, N. C., in July. Out of their meeting the Biblical Recorder takes courage. It says: "There is certainly a better spirit in our denomination than has been for the past four or five years. All the Southern Baptist papers seem to have decided that the time has come to leave off the discussion of matters which have divided us for years, and to give themselves to the promotion of the great things of the kingdom."

"J. N. Giannini, one of the wealthiest Italians of the United States, was received in special audience by Mussolini," quotes the Scottish Rite News. "The dictator treated him with unusual cordiality and distinction. It is understood that Giannini has placed his wealth at the disposal of Mussolini to aid in the furtherance of the latter's plan to promote fascism in the United States. Giannini, who comes from California, also conferred with the head of the foreign fascists."

Indications appear that the fundamentalist-modernist controversy is about to invade the M. E. church with some vigor. George F. Washburn, director general of the Bible Crusaders of America is a member of that church. He charges Bishop Charles E. Locke with apostasy in saying that "the authority of the Bible, the deity of Christ, the efficacy of Christ's saving life and death, the reality of the resurrection and Christ's leadership of his people, are non-essentials, and the progress of Christ's kingdom does not depend upon any one or all of these five points." He demands the deposition of Bishop Locke and by way of ultimatum declares: "We shall urge this action in charges at the next general conference as a test case for him and other bishops and officials."

Secretary Crabtree of the National Education Association urges the teaching of temperance in all schools, to deal not only with alcoholic beverages but with drug consumption, dress and recreation. For telling leaflets on the current prostitution issue nothing better has arrived than "Ammunition for the Campaign," including a clipsheet and eight flyers. The whole can be had for ten cents a copy by writing to 1 Arsenal square, Cambridge, Mass., women's national committee for law enforcement.

At the National Negro Baptist Convention recently held at Fort Worth, Texas, Rev. L. K. Williams was reelected president. In his address he recommended several measures for the conservation or promotion of the convention's work, among them being the unification of the publishing business of the convention, the training and employment of native workers for work on the foreign field, and the promotion of a better mutual understanding and cooperation between races.

Methodist standards for the ministry in Zion's Herald. It shows that of those admitted into full ministerial connection last year, forty-one had only eighth grade education, seventy had part of a high school course, forty-eight had only completed high school, 102 had only a college course, 183 were college graduates and of thirty-six who did some postgraduate work only fourteen won the degree of M. A. Of these men 229 had no theological education, ninety-two had received only partial theological training, 102 graduated from a seminary and of the graduates 102 received a degree in theology.

According to the Living Church, the test of religious experience is not, "What has it done for you?" but "What has it made you do for God?"

The Central Christian Advocate ruminating upon the discontinuance of the Washington Christian Advocate, mentions the following great religious papers having masterful editors which have ceased publication in recent years: the New York Observer, the Evangelist, the Herald and Presbyterian, the Continent, and Christian Work.

Now the rationalists are catching the questionnaire habit. The Christian World publishes one of fourteen points which is now going the rounds in England, every question to be answered by yes or no. As with most questionnaires on religious subjects, it is skillfully framed to trip up somebody, and the man who answers it by the code will deserve the fall that awaits him.

Even British are catching the idea that muddling does not pay. A delegation of British trade unionists visited the United States to study industrial conditions, particularly as to efficiency and wages. Its report registers admiration at the superior equipment, the large use of electric power, the excellent relations between employers and employes, and especially, that employers favor high wages. Speaking for British workmen, it says: "If we had America's electric power, and some of its best machinery, together with the good feeling which undoubtedly exists between the workmen and the management in industrial plants in the United States, we could hold our own with the best in the world."

Must social progress always cost some honest people their bread? The use of advanced machinery in making glass in the United States is throwing many out of employment in Czecho-Slovakia.

Excavations at Shechem are said to have uncovered the temple of El Berith, approximately of the date of Abraham, revealing a modified type of monotheism. This discovery if true and rightly interpreted would account for Melchisedek.

Basil Matthews, reporting the assembly of the League of Nations in the British Weekly, notes two tendencies exhibiting themselves in that body as they have done in diplomacy generally since the war. In his happy phrase, one group "thinks imperially," the other "thinks internationally." Both groups are well represented in America, and a third group thinks idiotically.

No one who teaches atheism ought to be permitted to teach in the public schools, in the opinion of the Biblical Recorder. This raises one of the problems of democracy. Theoretically the state has no more concern with any religious or irreligious ism than it has with the color of people's hair. But community life requires endless accommodation and adjustment, and nobody is likely to continue to teach in the public schools to whose religious or political opinions the mass of patrons have violent objection. Even the constitution cannot change that fact.

Oswald W. S. McCall in a survey of prospects for the second quarter of the century, reminds those who are enamored of the glories of present civilization that it was from heaven Lucifer fell. He itemizes as probabilities, that science will ripen off some of its immaturities, that education will eliminate Dayton trials and that world security or world disaster will come, that democracy is to undergo a new testing, that we are going to have a struggle to emancipate ourselves from the rule of sentimentalism and prejudice, that we shall have to take a new reckoning with the cultures of the East, and that Christian evidence must shift from miracle and prophecy to the character of Christ.

"Government control of the sale of liquor," meaning probably, the sale of liquor by the government, is objectionable to the Presbyterian of the South. But this particular program is a subject upon which many people have not taken the pains to think clearly. Government control of the business is what practically all nations are trying in some form. In the United States the experiment takes the form of legal prohibition of the business while leaving in private hands the means for carrying on the business and the property rights involved. What some of us have thought from the first may prove true at last, that in order to stop the abuse of alcohol it will be necessary to transfer to the government all property rights in the business. Hitherto a theoretical prejudice against such a transfer of rights has prevented any respectful public consideration of this necessity.

"THE GROVES WERE GOD'S FIRST TEMPLES."

young men of the United States learn things besides "Squads" target practice and carrying a Every encouragement is given for worship of God. Here a typical of students at the Fort Snelling camp is engaged in divine worship. Chaplain Rideout is being assisted by one of the ministers and choirs from a twin city church. The open-air arena is used for wrestling bouts and pugilistic combats on week-day evenings. Patriotic lectures and other gatherings are centered within this area.

In three of the larger cities and in six counties in Ohio, the Protestant churches will unite in evangelistic campaigns this fall.

Great associational meetings fill current reports of the southern Baptist papers. All reports from the northern field are equally encouraging.

The issue of the Word and Way for Sept. 16 is an unusually attractive number in quality of paper, make-up, and contents. It specializes on Baptist work in Missouri.

Charles A. Brown, a patent attorney, not a constitutional lawyer, of Chicago, has found another reason why the eighteenth amendment to the constitution is unconstitutional. He thinks that state conventions ought to have been called to consider its ratification. Call the next witness.

Dr. Wm. E. Barton studies evangelism in an article in the Dearborn Independent and concludes that none of the great organized revival movements that have arisen in the United States within the last fifty years can be viewed as a satisfactory demonstration of evangelism. The Moody movement seems to him most nearly satisfactory and they taper all the way down to the Billy Sunday meetings.

Dr. Elwood Meads, United States commissioner of reclamation, returning from a tour in Haiti, finds great improvement in conditions under American rule. He says, as reported: "Haiti is today a flourishing country with excellent schools, good roads, a sanitation system which has been revolutionized and a public debt which was diminished by about $2,500,000 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1926." The picture is attractive and doubtless correct. How does it look to the Haitians?

Allusion has been made in these columns to the educational progress of North Carolina. The Editor and Publisher calls attention to the same subject in this wise: "The average New Yorker, of course, high hats North Carolina as deep in the back woods, but North Carolina is a half century ahead of New York in the practical matter of free union schools and bus service, giving even the negro population advantages that excel those provided for white children in New York rural sections known to this writer."

Rev. Edward Shillito, widely known and observant Congregational minister of England, has been visiting in the United States. Readers of THE BAPTIST will read with interest his experience with prohibition in this country as narrated by him in the Christian Century, thus: "I have still to see the first case of a man or woman drinking alcohol. I have heard how, if I were keen upon such an experience, as I am not, I might secure a bottle of whisky. I have learned of places in which men do drink. But it can at least be reported that drink is not introduced to a visitor; he has to take the initiative; and whatever drinking is done, it is not done openly."

A New Ship of Fellowship

"YOU see I live up to my name and am a dreamer," wrote Joe Taylor of Chengtu, West China, in a recent letter. Joseph, the dreamer, and Joe, the practical man of affairs, are well combined in this intrepid missionary who labors for Christ in that vast region which furnishes the sources of the mighty Yangtse river and marks the boundary between China and Burmese India. The dream to which "Joe" had reference is best told in his own words: "I wish we might have a ship of fellowship sent out from America to the Far East. It should be filled with Christian men and women who come in the spirit of brotherhood to learn and help. I don't suppose such a thing is possible within the bounds of the Northern Baptist Convention; but it might be worked out as an interdenominational project."

Is this but the vision of a visionary, the illusion of an idealist, the fantasy of a dreamer? Will the suggestion stand up under the practical test of common sense? Evidently the one who made the suggestion feared for his reputation as a cool-headed, well-balanced business man when he wrote of it as the chimera of a dreamer. But when all the elements that enter into such a suggestion are deliberately considered we do not find it impracticable or impossible. Only the other day we found the newspapers and magazines featuring in full-page advertisements a university to be conducted aboard a modern ocean liner with a full faculty of professors, definite courses of study with full college credit, athletics, and in addition, that something which no intramural college can offer, the unparalleled benefits of seeing the world. The cost of one year of nautical college education including everything is surprisingly low, $2500. The first announcements carried the information that of the 500 reservations held for students more than two-thirds of them had been taken at once, thus proving the eagerness of parents to give their sons the advantages of pelagic pedagogy.

Every summer we hear of groups of men under the leadership of Sherwood Eddy and others equally competent taking two or three months abroad to study world conditions at first hand and to meet the leaders in religion, politics, industry, and international affairs. The men who have had this privilege are enthusiastic in praise of such a "seminar," as it might be called. The cost is within the financial ability of almost any young man who cares to save for a little while with such a trip in view. Europe has never seen so many Americans abroad as it has seen this year. Travel is popularized by speed and comfort and economy. It is almost as cheap to travel as to stay at home. China is now more accessible to us and reached in much less time from America than New Orleans from New York fifty years ago. Therefore we see no insuperable obstacles in the way of filling a ship of fellowship with Christian men and women from America bent upon visiting the Far East and seeing for themselves the progress and problems of the missionary enterprise.

Of course, the spirit in which such a fellowship goes forth on its mission will have much to do with the results. Our dreamer guards this point when he writes, "men and women who come in the spirit of brotherhood to learn and to help." Could the spirit and object of Christian fellowship be framed in better phrase? Love and study and service furnish the motive, the method, and the activity of such a mission. No room here for prejudice, for heresy-hunting, for missionary-baiting. A ship of family fellowship where brotherhood and sisterhood prevail; where a serious purpose to discover the facts and their significance gives tone to all personal and group activities; and where no one is happy until he has put into some form of constructive service the information and inspiration of the trip.

How shall we go about the task of sending the new ship of fellowship forth at an early date? We are not lacking in experience in sending out ships of fellowship. The most interesting parts of our recent history as a denomination recite the story of food and clothing and money sent to our suffering brethren in the stricken areas of Europe. Somebody caught the vision, somebody had a dream. The dream was told to others who took it up and organized it on business lines; the publicity machinery of the denomination was put in motion, and the thing was done. Here is the dream of a new ship of fellowship. Joe Taylor has told his dream to us. We tell it to the denomination. Who will organize the suggestion and make it a reality? We know of nothing in the form of an investment that will yield as much to the investors of actual value in spiritual wealth as this, as yet nebulous, vision. And should the dream of this honored missionary come true we see in it a new day for the evangelization and Christianizing of the world.

"We Are Not Divided"

DISCUSSIONS of Christian union sometimes puzzle us. The editor of the Christian Union Quarterly deplores the lack of "unity" between northern and southern Baptists and quotes a southern Baptist as saying that there is not even any desire for "unity" with northern Baptists. Much depends upon what the two men were thinking about. Did they have the same idea of union in mind? If organic union of the northern and southern conventions was meant, of course, no Baptist, either north or south proposes it. Why should they so unite? Both bodies are now of unwieldy size. Whenever any project of common interest arises there is no difficulty about co-operating in it. Baptists of both conventions stand together sympathetically and intelligently for historic Baptist principles and practices. They face the future with a common purpose and move in actual comradeship toward its achievement. A Baptist is the same sort of person religiously in Florida, Oregon, Minnesota, Texas and Maine. How, in this world of human approximations, there could be any more perfect unity and fellowship among them is hard to see. Ripples of disagreement and sometimes gales of debate sweep across the face of the denomination, but little attention is paid to territorial lines and convention boundaries. Tears shed in the cause of unity on account of the existence of autonomous Baptist conventions are wasted tears. Such conventions express the genius of our happy fellowship.

More Than Two Hundred Pensioners

IT IS less than six years since the retiring pension fund plan of the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board was put in operation; and today there are 207 retired ministers and missionaries drawing their pensions. Soon after the plan was inaugurated scores of applications poured into the office of the board in New York and the stream has never diminished. Nearly 2000 names are now registered on the list of those who have paid their dues and have become members of the retiring pension group. In addition to these, about 2000 ministers and dependents of deceased ministers, not in the pension plan, are receiving aid from the board in regular quarterly instalments.

In this issue on another page, Secy. P. C. Wright has written a special letter to laymen in which these and other salient facts are set forth. The motive for this special letter lies in the fact that ministers are reluctant to present the pension fund plan to their people because such presentation would seem to be in their own interests. Hence the work and progress of the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board fails to get the publicity which is necessary to the information and inspiration of the pews. But in reality there is no good reason for hesitancy on the part of the pulpit to inform the pews on this important matter. When a pastor enlightens his people on any topic that has to do with his own particular work as a minister of Christ he never thinks of himself personally, but rather of the office of pastor and of the broad sweep of the kingdom of God. In this ample category is found the organized arrangement of the denomination for taking care of its ministers and missionaries when the retiring age is reached, and, therefore, no pastor should permit his modesty to keep him from fully informing his people of the wise and safe provision offered by the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board for a pension when the shadows begin to lengthen.

We are enthusiastic for the retiring pension plan. By the grace and generosity of the board and its benevolent patrons supplemented by the annual gifts of the churches, membership in the pension plan is brought within easy reach of every minister in the denomination. By the payment of 6 per cent of his present salary the first year, he enters as a participant in the pension plan when he retires or becomes disabled. Thereafter the annual dues are 6 per cent of the salary, with this allowance: the board out of its permanent funds and current gifts pays 70 per cent of the annual dues of each member after the first year. That means if a minister's dues the first year are $180, which is 6 per cent of a $3000 salary, the second year and each year thereafter, as the board is able to keep up the practice, the minister would pay only $54. There is nothing like this for Baptist ministers in all the realm of insurance or annuities. Churches should urge their pastors to get in, if they are not already in, and should the first payment seem a bit stiff for the pastor, it would be a gracious act on the part of the trustees to recommend to the church that the same be made a part of the annual budget for current expenses adopted by the congregation.

The Kiwanis Magazine Again

IN THE issue of THE BAPTIST of Sept. 11 an editorial appeared commending the loyalty of Kiwanians in subscribing for their magazine and incidentally deploring the fact that Baptists did not appear so favorable in subscribing for THE BAPTIST. From a number of Kiwanians who are also Baptists we have learned that the annual dues to the Kiwanis club include the price of the subscription to the magazine. By military method each member in good standing is automatically a subscriber to the official organ of Kiwanis. This fact did not appear in the report of the executive secretary of Kiwanis from which we gleaned our information. The report led us to think that all subscriptions to the magazine were voluntary, and upon that impression the editorial was written. It has come to our attention also that the house organs of all institutions similar to Kiwanis and of all fraternal orders are sent to the members because the annual subscriptions are collected with the dues and included in the yearly membership fees. We therefore apologize for our inadvertent reflection upon the loyalty of Baptists as compared with the loyalty of Kiwanis, for we are assured that if Kiwanians were free to subscribe for their magazine voluntarily as Baptists are free to take a denominational paper or let it alone, the Kiwanians would soon revert to the laxity of the Baptists and the circulation of the Kiwanis Magazine would not be a thing to shout from the housetop.

And yet the Kiwanians are free, but they have chosen to pool their freedom in a common vote authorizing the officers of the organization to include the magazine in the annual dues. This saves a vast amount of expense in soliciting individual subscriptions, maintains the dignity of the association, and enables the business management of the magazine to secure a vast amount of paid advertisements for each issue, thus providing a larger and better journal for the subscribers. It is a conviction with us that there would be no loss of freedom but a distinct gain in all that goes to make Baptists intelligent and the denominational organizations efficient if a similar method could be made operative with THE BAPTIST and Missions.

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

Who Won the War?

Who Lost the War?

Who started the war? People dread that question. They would rather fight another war than find the true answer. But now, somebody rises with the question, "Who lost the war?" The answer is easy. Those who lost their legs, their eyes, their arms, their health, their lives, their loved ones, their living, their liberty by the war, lost the war. Those toilers who must labor for more than half a century to come in order to pay the debts of the war, lost the war. Those who lost their moral and social ideals, hopes and courage because of the war, lost the war. Those who went into the war to make the world safe for democracy, and now find the rulers of the victor nations sneering at democracy, lost the war. Those who went into the war to end war, and now find the victor nations more truculent and militaristic than ever, lost the war. Those ministers who made their pulpits recruiting stations for a crusade in the name of Christ, and now find the world-wide missionary spirit of their people shriveled, lost the war. Who won? For answer, trace the trail of the $$, gained by the war.

Producers of Moving Pictures

Register Right Purpose and Gains

Pleas for clean movies, protest against vicious ones and notes of improvement have appeared in these columns. Now it is a pleasure to note that Mr. Will Hays has issued a statement equivalent to an order that "into no title there be allowed to enter any word, phrase, clause or sentence that directly or indirectly encourages the slightest disregard of law," and he goes on to specify the prohibition law. This statement is followed in the Motion Picture by this frank declaration on the general subject of morals of the movies: "Mistakes have been made, more will be made, but the effort is honest and earnest on the part of the members of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc., and the public's confidence will not be misplaced. The effort will continue steadily in the right direction." Such a declaration awakens additional hope and best wishes. It awakens particularly the hope that in the future those who are trying to arouse the drowsy moral appreciation of the public on the subject will receive from the business a sympathetic attitude instead of sneers and officious interference. From all angles, whether of the business, the church, the press or the public, urge the campaign for clean and cultural movies.

Organized Labor Is Coming to Its Own

The philosophy of the class struggle, whether professed or not, was the philosophy of the relations between employer and employe during the greater part of the last fifty years. Unions were organized to fight for labor's rights. Industry was a continuous battlefield. But in the most highly industrialized countries a rapid change is in progress. Employes are coming more and more to be owners and the unions themselves are going into business. Besides, the very form of organization is changing from the trade union to the shop union, from the horizontal to the vertical type. Employing corporations are equally affected by the change. The corporation that does not, at least in theory, recognize the full human rights of all of the people who constitute its industrial community, is losing respectability in the world of business. There is growing unwillingness to resort to the lockout and the strike. The coming philosophy of industrial relations is that of community interest. More and more, the problems that arise in the relations between labor and capital are seeking a solution on the basis of that philosophy. Slowly society is moving toward that condition in which the economic power of the community will be organized co-operatively to provide for the economic needs of the community. That is the true goal of the labor union.

A Single Word May

Start One Going

Dr. Albert Edward Wiggam may or may not know where he is going, but on the way he makes some interesting discoveries. He notes that certain words used for "stimulus words" to test the mental recall of different persons, produce remarkably varied results. The first ideas of different persons hearing the word "grand," for instance, were hair, piano, holidays, canyon, Cadillac, horse, glorious time, stand, queens, millionaires, operas, and Valentino. By trying several "stimulus words" in a given group of individuals, people may be classified intellectually. The experiment is fascinating. How far does it account for people's reactions of approval or hostility when they hear some theological catchword?

Glorious Independence

Has Some Consequences

Independence is a word to conjure with. Time was when it represented an ideal. Now it represents a prejudice or an excuse for something that prefers a pleasing pseudonym. But the notion seems to be as contagious as measles. Ireland wants independence from England, Ulster from Ireland, the Philippines from the United States, Mindanao from the Philippines, Alsace from France. That is, when one people has achieved independence and security it has no assurance that some section of its population will not desire in turn to separate from it and set up for themselves. On what principle does one group acquire the right of secession and at the same time the right to forbid secession to another group? How far has one group of humans either the right or the power to live separately from the rest?

Is Public Service a

Parasitical Business?

The Dearborn Independent complains that there are between two and a half and three million persons on the federal, state and municipal payrolls. It says, "Each American family contributes an average of $123 a year from its income for the support of these job holders." Is a man who works for the government more a job-holder than he who works for a corporation? There are 800,000 school teachers; shall we dismiss them? Are the mail-carriers parasites? If there are mere jobs set up for deserving politicians, point them out and clean them up. But these millions of government employes, considered generally, are rendering a necessary service for which the people must pay, no matter who performs it. A comparison may be challenged. Is there any fairly representative group of three million wage and salary earners from whose service the people get more good for less money than from government employes? Let there be an analytical study of this question and an end of sneers at government service. Suppose the matter be turned about and the question of the people getting what they pay for asked at the door of private and corporate business. The Pennsylvania and Illinois primaries were not bought with the money of government employees.

Why Do Voters Refuse to Vote?

For the case is one not merely of neglect, but of refusal. Whatever may be the occult reasons, there are plenty of reasons lying on the surface. Mere negligence is one. Then, there are lack of a sense of moral responsibility, a low degree of community spirit, optimistic confidence that government will go on all right anyway, a pessimistic feeling that money and demagogues have control of the government and that voting will do no good, the difficulty of choosing between unsatisfactory candidates and parties, an impression that government is a minor matter, thinking one vote is so insignificant that it is not worth while to suffer the inconvenience and loss of time necessary to go to the polls, the artificial difficulty of political expression for minorities, and finally sheer ignorance and incompetency. No scientific approach to the problem of the absentee voter has yet been undertaken. But it is due, and the future of democratic government depends upon it.

Can Scolding Cure the Incompetence of Democracy?

For years public men and public papers have been decrying politics and declaring government to be an inferior or dubious organ of society. For years business has been buying up the talents of the country and depriving the government of the service of its best men and women. For years those teachers, legislators, and administrators who have ventured bravely to think through public problems and to propose actual measures of enlightened policy in government have been systematically and mercilessly put under the axe. For years the public has been assiduously taught that the rightful rulers of the country are its business leaders. For years influential sources of public information have sneered at government by the people. For years political organizations and leaders have been bought and sold like cattle in the market. For years political organization has been so manipulated as to paralyze any effective collective effort of the rank and file of citizens to determine public policy. For years the churches and schools have been aware of these things and have stood by while the country drifted. And now, suddenly, with no apparent effort to change these conditions, it has become conventional form to denounce the absentee voter. Current boosting for a full vote sounds like such an advertisement as this: Wanted, thirty million voters who will vote and fight as they are told. If not, precisely what is proposed?

What Is the Remedy for Abstention from Voting?

Begin at the bottom. Let churches, schools, and other agencies of education set themselves to create a competent electorate. Let all organs of social expression magnify government as the big business of the nation. Constitution day is good; utilize it to show that as a document of social value the constitution is far above all of the charters of all of the corporations. Stop denouncing congress and the legislature and call for the biggest men and women of the country to fill them. Treat public office as the highest honor of society rather than as a burrow for private grafters. Instead of muzzling official effectiveness and stabbing it in the back, bestow special honor upon it. Invite from every quarter, from the most conservative to the most radical, suggestions for better government, and give opportunity for experimental tests under practical conditions. Substitute the group system for the district system in the election of lawmakers. Make it a crime for a corporation or an official of a corporation to contribute toward the expenses of a political campaign, candidate or party. Grade the electorate by competency and distribute the privilege of voting accordingly. Then invite the voters to come on. They will need no invitation.

What Is Meant by the Proposal for a Minimum Wage?

The social program of the Federal Council of Churches proposes a minimum wage sufficient for comfort and decency, and is therefore suspected of dangerous radicalism. Yet how tame it is compared with the ethics of Christianity! No principle of economic adjustment is just that operates for a less time than the whole of a human life. In pure Christian ethics every person is bound from the beginning to the end of his life to do his best for all. So doing, every person is entitled from the beginning to the end of his life to participate in all of the best equally with any other. All questions of ownership, industrial control and wages must be determined by these principles. The proposal of the churches, radical as it may sound, is merely a partial approximation to the truth. The ideal should never be obscured that those who equally do their best for the common good are entitled equally to enjoy the best of the common good. To achieve the realization of this principle in the highest degree is the aim which gives validity to all industrial and political control.

One Will Live Forever, The Other Will Disband

Two news items stand almost side by side in the papers. One is a declaration by some enthusiastic official of the American Legion that his organization is founded for permanency and will live forever. The other is a report that a committee of the Grand Army of the Republic is recommending a plan for the disbandment of that organization. The Confederate Veterans will soon go the same road and the picture, "The End of the Trail," may symbolize both of those armies of the civil war. What assurance has the American Legion of greater perpetuity than theirs? To one who remembers living veterans of Napoleon's grand army, the scene seems so transitory. No; presently the young men of the American Legion so proud and patriotically enthusiastic will grow gray hairs bend, totter and pass, and a world organized for peace will wonder why an army ever existed.

"There Lives More Faith in Honest Doubt, Believe Me."

So sings Tennyson. But the Western Christian Advocate sounds a warning note. It says: "A man may play with his doubts until they enslave him. Those minds that train themselves to associate with interrogations soon strike the path of uncertainty and lose their way." Yes and yes. But to play with doubt is one thing; to face it frankly and honestly is another. A question concerning the foundations of faith is neither sin nor suicide. The sin lies in fiddling with it, playing hide and seek with it perhaps dodging it, perhaps using it as a smoke screen or an amusement. The power to inquire and to ask questions is a saving grace if rightly used. Thus, to quote Tennyson again, "He came at length to find a stronger faith his own."

Fruits Worthy of Repentance

Bring forth therefore fruits worthy of repentance.—Matthew 3:8.

BY PERE SANSON

Pere Sanson, it is said, has created a stir in France greater than that of any other preacher for many years. His audiences at Notre Dame, Paris, during Lent numbered about 6000 men each Sunday. The following is part of an hour's sermon delivered to a vast audience in Holy Week (as part of a "retreat" given to men). It was translated by Rev. F. C. Spurr for the Christian World Pulpit.

THIS word of St. John the Baptist, I now, in the name of the church, address to you, men of the twentieth century. "Out-of-date language," you cry. No, gentlemen, it is language always living and pressing upon us, a charge which has never been more opportune than now. We find no pleasure in disparaging our own time and in claiming for the past a superiority over the present; yet is it not clear that the thirst for happiness, and for the money which procures it, rages in our day with a fearful intensity, and that in order to satisfy it those who are devoured by it sacrifice all their heart, their conscience, their honor, and the heart, the conscience and the dignity of their neighbors? Their lives are a tissue of sins, like the lives of the hearers of John the Baptist, but with this regrettable peculiarity: in the time of the Forerunner of Christ men did not deny the fact of sin, and therefore, they were the more ready to renounce it; in our epoch men dispute its reality and so bar the way to the idea and to the practice of mortification.

It is important that we realize both the existence of sin and that which constitutes its gravity. It consists fundamentally in the free rejection by man of the true life which is offered to him by God, and of his preference for an empty and animal life carrying with it spiritual death. The branch is wilfully severed from the sap which alone can give it life; it withers and falls at the foot of the tree by which it subsists, by which alone it can grow and bear bud and fruit. There is no greater malady than this; but is it a malady without remedy? No. The object of the preaching of John the Baptist is to indicate what this remedy is. "Repent!" he cried. Repentance, this is the secret of liberation from spiritual death. But what is, in reality, this repentance?

A Spiritual Act

It implies, first, a spiritual act, by which the sinner, with awakened conscience, clearly understands the false orientation which sin gives to his life, and sincerely avows that the past which he evokes is his own doing and that he has neither the right to deny his guilt, nor the power to efface it. Then he pauses in the specious way to which his pride has brought him and hearkens to that inner voice which speaks to him with as much force as the voice of the Baptist when he cried to the crowds which presented themselves for baptism, "Repent." . . . So, by thought, he reascends the path down which he passed so lightly.

Do you desire, my brethren, that together we shall now travel this road, obstructed as it is with horrors of all kinds? . . . There is at the end of this road another victim of sin who embraces all others in himself. Behold that inanimate body, nailed to a cross; it is God himself who became man for love of us, and who for love of us has carried the load of our sins. Before the horror of that spectacle, pause, and try to understand something of that law of personal expiation to which every human being must submit himself, in union with the Son of God who of his own will was crucified to convince the world of the deadly reality of sin.

The second step demanded by repentance is the sincere resolution to repair the evil we have committed, and to do this not only in form but truth. We cannot atone for the seduction of a woman by the check we send her; for the abandonment of a child by the gift of a statue to a church; for the attack upon the reputation of our neighbor by the offering of candles to burn upon the triangle, any more than we can atone for our idleness or our scorn for the divine law of work by pilgrimages which are often transformed into pleasure parties; or for wilful conjugal sterility by a subscription in favor of the increased families of others.

After reparation there is imposed upon us the obligation to "fly the occasions of sin." Unless this is done our repentance is superficial, or purely verbal and wholly worthless. We are, I hope, in agreement upon these points, and I shall not further insist upon them. But when these things are done, is repentance completed? No, it is only commenced. How, then, is it to be continued? The Baptist answers, "Bring forth fruits worthy of repentance." It is not a question of a series of extraordinary practices for which we may feel little attraction; it is a work of which our conscience, aspiring to justice and virtue, sets forth the imperious necessity. Two words, simple and profound, express this work: labor to become men.

Here, perhaps, your dread may be changed into surprise, and you say, "Is nothing more than this meant by bringing forth fruits worthy of repentance?" Yes; for to tend toward this ideal involves the bending of all our powers to the making of life. The work of construction necessary in order to become a man—that is, a moral and spiritual being, living already in the eternal and invisible world—implies a preliminary work, the purpose of which is to rough-hew the unformed block of the "under-man," that is, the man who is captivated by the allurements of perishable appearances and drawn down into the quicksand of material things.

This double work, which is a work of the whole life, John the Baptist proposed to his contemporaries under a picturesque formula, which as we meditate upon it, will enable us to seize the true notion of repentance. "Let every mountain and hill be brought low and every valley be filled, and make straight the way of the Lord."

After Repentance

Having heard the rough call of the Baptist to repentance, his listeners addressed to him the question, "What then shall we do?" To the crowd he said, "He that hath two coats let him impart to him that hath none, and he that hath food let him do likewise." To the publicans he said, "Extort no more than that which is appointed you." To the soldiers, "Do violence to no man, neither exact anything wrongfully, and be content with your pay."

The repentance which the Baptist preached carried no terrible austerity. It is a word of order. Under no pretext apply violence to your neighbor and do not impose upon him. Do not be hard upon your unhappy brother. Said in another way, "Put to death within you the man naturally wayward, avaricious, ambitious, masterful, so that the Messiah, sweet, humble, just, and good may come to you."

Let us consider these terms. First, do violence to none. Never, perhaps, could this counsel be more opportune than today when violence is elevated to the dignity of a civilized and moral way of life. You, in places of power, who would employ brutal force under the pretext of maintaining order, and you, in lower grades, who would attack the life and the property of others under the pretext of establishing justice, however sincere you both may be, you are radically wrong, in that you count upon violence to assure the triumph of your ideas. By this I do not mean that the use of force may not be necessary at times—for example, to repel another force which seeks to enslave you—but even in such a case there is always place for the introduction of an intention which will remove from it animal reaction or selfish spite. In replying to the soldiers, John the Baptist was complete in his role of the Forerunner of Christ, whose "mission it was and is to establish the law of gentleness as the only true means of rendering the earth habitable." We men of the twentieth century, coming 1900 years after the proclamation of the charter of love which gives sanctity to every human life, ought we not to comprehend with still more delicate insight the word of the Baptist? Do violence to no man; hold in horror not only that brutality which is cynically brazen, but still more that brutality which hypocritically borrows the lineaments of humanity.

Soul Searching

Fathers of families, have you never sought under the cloak of your paternal authority to stifle in the soul of your child the germ of a great ideal, the commencement of a vocation to a life of generosity and sacrifice, solely because such an orientation of his life would displease you, because you do not wish to see reduced to nothing the career which your ambition and thirst for worldly honors had been preparing for twenty years? Fearing to force a direct issue by a formal opposition, you have had recourse to disloyalty and to perfidy. You have employed one after the other, bantering, captious reasonings and wheedling entreaties. Perhaps you have gone to the length of throwing in his way some scandalous temptation.

Husbands, under the pretext that the law of marriage made you the head of the family and gave you authority over your wife, have you never trampled underfoot the rights of her soul, have you never wounded her in the depths of her being?

Men of affairs, men of letters, philosophers, artists, have you never transformed a legitimate emulation into a dishonest rivalry, and in order to acquire or maintain a name, a reputation or a place, resorted to falsehood and calumny?

And you, public men, in order to gain your cause over your political or social adversaries, have you never perverted their words or changed their meaning?

And you, the privileged of fortune, have you never abused the power your position has conferred upon you by trafficking in the labor of your necessitous brother, or by imposing upon him a leonine contract, or, worse still, by outraging his conscience? You have in your hands the future of your subordinates; their bread and that of their families depends upon you. This crime of the abuse of power, have you never committed it under the cloak of zeal, perhaps under the cover of charity, professed believers that you are? How much more odious is it when such a crime is committed by so-called religious men. Who among us has not upon one or other of these points, to acknowledge that he ought in his soul to "bring down the mountains and fill up the valleys?"

Selfishness behind Revolution

But it is not sufficient to repudiate all ideas of violence and fraud. The Baptist gave another counsel of which the opportunity has yet known no eclipse. "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none, and he that hath food let him do likewise." . . . One point is beyond dispute: to close the heart to the distress of our neighbor is unjust. Yes, unjust, not legally, perhaps, but morally, before men who are men, and before God who has made the heart of men. When we are guilty of this injustice we are out of the way of repentance. He who amidst a sumptuous feast has no thought for the hungry, and he who, well and liberally housed and surrounded with all modern comforts, has no thought for the physical and moral misery of the slum dweller, does not merit the name of a man. What name remains to him? Let him be as refined, as intelligent, as rich, as celebrated as you will, he is nothing but an elegant and gilded brute. Let him not curse the revolutions which rumble in the distance; it is he who prepares them and he who will unchain them. Beyond these, it is necessary to say of him who, seeing the cost of living rise higher and higher has no care to soften the repercussions of this terrible phenomenon upon his workmen, if he be a professed Christian he is a scourge to that religion which he professes, and he drives from it men of good-will to whom he presents it, in his own person, as a horrible caricature. . . . To modern Pharisees John the Baptist would say as to the Pharisees of his time: "Repent sincerely, or better be out of the church. In neglecting sincerity, mercy and justice and remaining faithful only to certain rites which cost little, you forget the very essentials of the evangelical law and you offer one reason why religion becomes debatable and even odious in the eyes of many. In calling yourselves Christians you inflict injury upon Jesus Christ." But the Baptist would also add, "God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham."

Listen, my unbelieving brethren, who suffer from your unbelief and who seek the truth. Listen, poor victims of a withering scepticism for which you are not wholly responsible. In the same way as to the Pharisees, I recall you to the indispensable condition of becoming true children of God. It is not in vain, surely, that in ending this instruction I have demanded sincerity on the part of all. If sincerity is the only possible solid base of true human relations, it is also the only foundation of all our relations with God and the gospel. We commence to be sincere with God only as we have earnestly sought to be sincere with ourselves and with others. It is the indispensable condition for the undertaking of the ultimate and last work of repentance, i.e. the transformation of our whole being, that of the sinner of today into the first man of tomorrow. . . . Seek the pure heart, a heart eager for light and love, a heart ready to open itself to truth and love, because it has understood that without light and love it cannot live, and that this light and love are not pure abstractions, but supreme realities made effective in Jesus Christ. Accept salvation. Accept life and you will experience how good it is to walk in the ways of the Lord.

What Ails Our Young People?

To admit the presence of a problem is salutary; to analyze it helps diagnosis

BY HORACE T. HOUF

TO BE good, honestly good, in this generation requires more moral effort than in any generation history tells us about. For one thing, elemental human nature changes little. The same instincts and passions and appetites are born anew with every child that comes into the world. Then, the earth is shrinking because of human inventions and we are having to live with one another in intimate proximity. The thought world our young people inherit is shot through with assumptions and customs that bind and that resent inspection. Scores of new inventions put into our hands powers and temptations hard to control. To be good in these days by any readily acceptable standard is not easy.

Criticism may or may not help the situation. To join the chorus of those who have nothing good to say about change in general and about the changing young people in particular, is easy and cheap. And it is as futile as it is easy. The normal reaction of conventionalized folk is to do this. It requires no thought, only articulation.

The outlines of history can be fairly accurately traced for about seven thousand years. A few years ago a professor from the University of Iowa was in Europe and spent a few days in Constantinople. There he visited a museum and was shown an ancient tablet, dating back to 3800 B. C. The curator read the translation of the inscription for him. It said the younger people were becoming so careless of the customary ways of living and so critical of accepted ways of thinking, that those in authority were much concerned for the future. Apparently concern about changing ideas and customs and the young people is no new thing. It is however, no negligible thing. As parents and educators and churchmen, we must concern ourselves with these matters. An analysis of our present situation may be helpful.

More Numerous

Modern young people are much more in evidence than heretofore. There are more of them; there are more of us all. The growth of population in the United States from 1800-1900, was 1332 per cent. This growth was unprecedented. Belgium was nearest us with 204 per cent. Germany had 143 per cent increase, and France only 43 per cent. Even with our numberless acres, such increase fills them up materially. There are now more than one hundred ten million of us. Of these there are eight million boys between twelve and nineteen years of age. With as many girls of similar age, we have about sixteen million young people who are adolescents. Many of them are in high schools and colleges, others are busy in gainful occupations. Along with this increase in numbers has gone a steady growth of cities. At present our urban population is growing seven and one-half times as fast as our rural. Already 52 per cent of the people live in cities or towns of more than 25,000 people. With our modern development of steam and electric transportation and the steady development of good roads, several per cent more are having their lives dominated by city and town institutions and habits.

Perhaps Prof. G. A. Coe is correct in saying that it is the present environment, the setting of their lives, that inclines our young people to be different and makes it difficult for them to conform to ideas and customs adopted in other times. One important change is the elimination of distance. The telegraph came first. Now the telephone is in almost every neighborhood, if not in every home, and enables him who will to communicate with others quickly and easily—a mile away or hundreds of miles. The automobile, too, has made distance of little consequence. With our roads being ever improved, the automobile tends to make the country folk townspeople and the townspeople, city folk.

Young people today are frequently better informed than the young people of yesterday. We have compelled them to submit to our great informing system. If education is a good thing everybody ought to have it. So we have compelled them to spend several years in school. Probably the bright young graduate of our modern high school is better informed on things in general than were even the wise men of ancient times. We pile high about them the books, magazines, and newspapers whose inoculation we want them to take. Compared with their grandparents they are an informed and trained generation. Compared with us, their older contemporaries, they need not be ashamed on this score. More and more, we incline to forego dogmatism in their presence, and upon occasion even ask them things we need to know.

A World of Divertisement

The stimuli that play upon our young people are innumerable multiplied. Life almost screams at them on all sides. They live in a world of divertisements and advertisements. Their attention is challenged endlessly. The highways are plastered with invitations to consider the merits of articles of all sorts, and a psychologized ad admonishes them to "read this aloud" so as to autosuggest themselves into a proper appreciation of a much-heralded brand of cigaret. The excitement of athletic prowess and competition is everywhere. Space on the sports page is as coveted as front page headlines. Big league teams, university elevens, and college quintets reign supreme. The daily recital of their campaigns makes life worth living. Time fails us to speak of the best-sellers in made-to-order fiction, the boundless appeal of the movies, the fascination of the radio, and the perennial pull of parties and dances. Our young people are kept much alive, mentally dissipated, and more and more nerve depleted.

Religion has relaxed its hold noticeably. Parents are aware of the arrival of these informed, excited, emancipated, rationalized youngsters. They remember their own youth, in which remembrance the blunders and missteps were most exciting and chiefly stand out. In common honesty they incline to be more lenient than their rigorous pioneer forbears. Home training in religion is fading away. Even in many churches religion is rationalized until it is neither hot nor cold. Doctrinal foundations and emphases are shifted. The graciousness of God and the evolution theory of his way in the world have killed our sense of urgency. The purveyor of fear and vitriolic and wholesale condemnation is now a prophet without honor among the young people. They think they know better, and what is more, they do not care. An authoritative say-so does not prove it to them. They take religious instruction philosophically because it is probably a good thing. At least it is respectable and decent to do that. But as to being dogmatic or fanatical or sectarian or rigorous about it, why do that? They catch the spirit of present religious thinking and ways and without analyzing it, fall in. Religion has been rationalized and cooled down into one of several chief parts of our common philosophy. Young people feel toward it as they do toward the remainder of their inheritance from us.

The moral code of the young people is changing. This is inevitable, with the present many-sided emancipation in full swing. Their elders will see more new things in the world if something does not speedily short circuit the newly freed currents. More is being done to lengthen life and fulfil the native powers of many individuals. Young people are living in a "physical culture" age. Physically they are much alive. Their instincts are active. And in their young lives the race instinct is imperious. The fight for control is never ending and new influences are keeping the issue of their conflict in confusion. Women have achieved a new status. They have won educational rights equal with men. They have won political equality. They are fast finding economic and professional freedom. This means a social freedom and familiarity and give-and-take heretofore unknown. Men and women work side by side in life's enterprises. Young people mingle promiscuously and continuously in school and outside. In this enlarged intimacy things are happening among them.

Another less spectacular but potent influence is the universalizing of economic independence, the coming of ready cash and hand-to-mouth living. The most profound revolution since Christ's day has been our modern industrial development. Applied science, machinery, and industry dominate us. Commercial cities are the nuclei of our national life. Agriculture has steadily surrendered to organized industry. The wage system grips us like a vise. Our multitudes work in the employ of others. Pay checks are distributed weekly. We balance accounts with life, and judgment comes fifty-two times each year. Never did so many young people have earning power. Ready money is now a part of the fixed order. Cash in the pocket gives economic freedom from the parent and from restraint. It enables the slipping of the noose of control and sets youthful multitudes prematurely free. There is no observable escape from this immeasurably potent, recently arrived influence.

Our young people face no simple situation. They have real work ahead. After all, what are the new features we think we dislike in our youth? Do these statements stand for discernible traits becoming more prominent? Our young people are passionately fond of pleasure; they aggressively seek it and are devoted to it. They find some necessary sides of every-day life humdrum and commonplace, and are manifestly impatient of control, discipline and responsibility. Accepting as by contagion the dominant tone of a business-bossed world, they are more frankly individualistic and selfish. Toward others and toward life in general they are more familiar and flippant; they know too much and care too little. Increasingly are they conscious of their group and sensitive to group opinion; their elders have conspired to indoctrinate, conventionalize and restrain them, and half unconsciously they revolt. Other characterizations could be drawn, but what purpose?

It is enough. To admit the presence of a problem is salutary. To analyze it helps diagnosis. Many have thought on this one. It is of supreme concern to us parents, educators and churchmen. The situation is real and the last word cannot yet be said. We shall do well to be thoughtful and hopeful, and where we are to lend a hand.

Where France and Spain Meet

BY WINFRED ERNEST GARRISON

THE porter who took my baggage at Narbonne was a man of such dignity and seeming importance that I thought he must be at least the station master if not the division superintendent. Some one was making off with his truck and he recovered it, with an appropriate rebuke to the miscreant. The incident rankled in his mind as we traversed the length of the station and when we came to a stop he generalized upon it. "One has to look out for himself nowadays. Quick wits are all that count. Since the war we French no longer love each other." Thus he philosophized upon the borrowing of his truck, and he was serious about it.

Narbonne, once a Roman city like most of the towns in southern France, and a seaport of importance, is now so dead that it seems scarcely to remember that it was ever alive. It is reported that the causes of its demise were the development of new and better harbors and the expulsion of the Jews who were the main-stay of its trade. Both of these events happened a long time ago. Everything about Narbonne is completely finished except the cathedral. That consists curiously of a vast choir, and that is all. The nave was never built, though a few lofty columns and arches sketch its outlines. In the vestibule was a poster indicating an interesting effort of the church to control feminine fashions and reading. In view of the fact that many fashion papers and society magazines are "detestable and un-Christian," a list of forty or fifty periodicals was given, classified as "recommended," "and with some reservations," "more or less acceptable," and "generally excluded from Christian families." In several churches I have seen posted lists of recommended books for boys and girls, not all religious books but general literature. This policy of attempting to control by recommendation rather than by prohibition is sensible.

A pleasant episode in Narbonne gave me a glimpse of a level of society above what one meets in a third-class railway compartment where acquaintances are easily made. I was studiously observing a high wall which bore illegible inscriptions and headless reliefs, when an elderly woman and her young daughter paused to give me information. The wall was the sole remnant of the Roman rampart. The older woman's grandfather had preserved it when it was about to be torn down. It formed the front wall of her garden. They took me through the big iron gate and showed me the house and explained how they were going to make over an unused room into a conservatory. The mother said she was going to keep the house as a home for her daughter "whether she married or not; there are so few young men in France now." The daughter showed me the garden with its beautiful lily pond and took me up the shady slope which led to the top of the Roman wall and made a little terrace looking down at the sleepy city.

"So few young men in France now"—on reading the lists of "Les Morts" on the war memorials of villages one wonders that there are any. Les Beaux, a village of seventy-six inhabitants in the Rhone valley, perched on a crag and seemingly removed from every activity on the planet, lost ten. La Monta, a town at the end of a road in the Alps and scarcely larger than Les Beaux, recorded on her simple monument the names of twenty-one soldiers killed in battle. This was in the country of the Chasseurs des Alps, the so-called "Blue Devils," who probably lost more heavily than any other corps, especially in the early part of the war. A woman from another Alpine town told me that out of forty who went from her village, only one came back. No wonder there are "so few young men in France now." No wonder also that one sees chalked upon walls, "Down with the wicked wars in Morocco and Syria," and finds an anti-war meeting being held in Briançon, where every other man one meets on the street is a soldier.

Narbonne is well toward that corner of France where the Pyrenees rise abruptly from the Mediterranean. Still farther is the flourishing city of Perpignan as alive as the other is dead. In a city of (at a guess) 50,000 there seemed to be only one other tourist. No English is spoken and the French runs through a bewildering complication of shadings and minglings with Spanish and Catalan. It was Bastille day and a regiment of black Algerian soldiers paraded with a fine bugle-corps. They were fine, tall, sober-looking troops, very black, with flat noses and long chins, clad in red fez and khaki, men of Africa carefully trained to fight in the quarrels of Europe—in which they have no interest whatever.

It was my hope to find a few places in France where one would not be reminded of the war. Of course people do not talk about it all the while, but it seems to form an undercurrent of thought which is ever ready to come to the surface. I went from Perpignan down to the Spanish border and stopped on the way at Elne. In that town it seemed that one might escape into the remote past. I do not know how old it is, but its name was changed from something else to Elne in the fourth century in honor of Helena, the mother of Constantine. It was the seat of a bishopric for 1000 years, but its relics were removed to Perpignan 300 years ago and its sole remaining glory is the beautiful choir of the former cathedral. It is all ancient and placid. But at my table at the little hotel was a young Frenchman from Auvergne who had spent two years in Alsace during the war. He thought the people there had been well satisfied with German rule; they were better off under it than the people of Auvergne were under French. He spoke often of "the Boche" but without rancor. It was simply a colorless synonym for Germans. "What was the war all about anyway?" (Every ex-soldier I have met has asked that same question in almost the same way.) "It is time for us to get together." The Germans are working but, he thought, the French think only of pleasure and spending. (This is an unjust generalization.) With the franc falling there was little inducement to save.

It was only a few miles from Elne, past one or two simple seaside resorts and Port Vendres, from which boats sail to Algeria, to the last French town, Cerbère. I walked along the cliffs which rise abruptly from the Mediterranean, the abrupt beginning of the Pyrenees, and followed a trail over the mountains into Spain. It was a trail that might be used by smugglers, and probably is, for I met no frontier officials and learned where the boundary line was only by finding in a cabin a woman who spoke Spanish and said that the line was about 100 meters back. It was just about there that I had found a donkey standing like a sentry in the middle of the trail. I should have known. It never ceases to strike me as extraordinary when one crosses a purely imaginary line, a mere dotted line on the map indicating an international frontier, to find the natural phenomena so similar and the human phenomena so different on the two sides. The flowers and trees are the same, the winds blow across and the clouds drift over, but men have a different language and use different postage stamps. With a pocketful of money one finds himself suddenly without the means of buying a pound of peaches; or (if you are going into Italy) they suddenly begin to put grated cheese in your soup. Meddlesome officials manifest an absurd interest in your most ordinary possessions. When these evidences of artificial national differences occur in the presence of impressive natural scenery, they seem ridiculous to the point of pathos, but doubtless they have their uses.

The Spanish town of Port Bow, which I entered unceremoniously without even having my passport scrutinized, is a much more attractive place than the town on the French side, though the physical setting is so identical that one wonders whether one only dreamed about coming over the mountain, for there is the same little harbor with a gravel beach protected by the same encircling arms of rocky promontories. The memorable thing about Port Bow was a group of children. There were six of them to begin with. I asked some trivial question, probably the way up to a terrace which seemed to promise a good view. They not only told me; they came along. They were clean, beautiful, alert and courteous children. We made merry together and the company increased as we went. I suggested taking a motion-picture of them. Would they let me? Would they! They sent out couriers to round up their friends. At the last count there were twenty-one. Long after the picture was taken arrivals came dashing up breathless, to request special sittings. I hope the picture will show how pretty they were, ranging from the dark-eyed Spanish type to pronounced blonds—for, while this is Spain, it is also Catalonia, and the Catalans, whether on the French or Spanish side of the dotted line that governments have drawn, are a different people. They showed me the town, and when we visited the church they tip-toed about and talked in whispers, to resume full-voiced merriment the moment we came out into the sunshine. It was an incomparable, even if impromptu, reception committee.

A Question

WERE the whole world as good as you —not an atom better—
Were it just as pure and true,
Just as pure and true as you,
Just as strong in faith and works,
Just as free from crafty quirks,
All extortion, all deceit;
Schemes its neighbor to defeat,
Schemes its neighbor to defraud,
Schemes some culprit to applaud—
Would this world be better?

*If this whole world followed you—followed to the letter—
Would it be a nobler world,
All deceit and falsehood hurled
From it altogether?
Malice, selfishness and lust
Banished from beneath the crust
Covering human hearts from view—
Tell me, if it followed you,
Would this world be better?*

The Devotional Life

"Teach Us to Pray"

And it came to pass as he was praying in a certain place, that when he ceased, one of his disciples said unto him: "Lord, teach us to pray."—Luke 11:1

BY LEWIS W. SANFORD

WE do not wonder that these disciples, who had journeyed with Jesus, followed him through the day, slept by his side at night, and observed him turning constantly to his Father, should have felt in themselves a lack of something he possessed.

Their contact with him had kindled in them a desire to learn how to pray. John the Baptist had taught his disciples to pray, and it was only natural that these men should appeal to the Master of prayer to teach them its secret.

The prayer that Jesus gave them was a model petition for all time, beautiful in its simplicity, so brief that a child could learn it, yet all-inclusive, a wondrous example of what prayer should be—not long repetition, but the asking in faith for the needs of every day.

First Things First

Instinctively putting first things first, our Lord addresses the Father in heaven: "Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done."

Then follow our needs: "Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors."

Then a petition for deliverance from the power of sin: "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

And the prayer ends with ascription to the Father of all: "For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever and ever."

The request of the disciples which Jesus was here answering indicates that they wished not so much a form to repeat as knowledge of how to find thoughts and words for prayer. The opening sentence of the answer of Jesus, "After this manner pray ye," shows that he meant to give an outline, a model of what their prayers should be.

In the early church the saints were praying persons, and so has it been through succeeding ages.

Prayer always was a vital element in the church. Today, however, the church is weak in this respect. We are losing the art and forgetting the habit of prayer.

Many things for which men used to pray they do not now consider as subjects of prayer.

The Weather

Let us take, for example, the weather. To understand the difference between the mind of the past and the mind of the present in this matter, let us glance backward. In ancient times all people were polytheists, having many gods, each with a realm of authority. Every country had various gods, and it was easy to offer a petition to some special god for favors in the field over which he had control. But in all countries in course of time certain gods were exalted above others. We can see this today in India. Of millions of gods there, three, Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, tower above others. The powers and qualities of lesser gods are attributed to them.

It used to be comparatively easy for people to believe that rain was a blessing, or, in time of flood, a punishment.

In these days we know the laws of nature that govern the distribution of moisture. People used to pray for rain or fair weather. We do not. I am going tomorrow on a journey of 125 miles. A hundred other ministers are going, and of course we should like fair weather. But I doubt whether any one will pray for it. We must make the best of it, if it storms.

Where Men Disagree

You know the story of a church in the West that would call only a minister who was willing to pray for rain. It found a man who promised to do this if all would agree upon the time. The drought came, and the church members met together. But the minister could not get them to agree on the time that the rain should come. One had hay out; one was building a house; one was to have company. Nobody could be induced to give up his own little plan. So they had to leave the matter in the hands of God.

That is what we all must do. We cannot ask God to shift his purposes. Mill-owners want water. Wells go dry. What a mix-up there would be if every group got the weather it wanted!

In considering for what we ought to pray, it is difficult to know where to draw the line. One man says: "God knows my needs. Prayer cannot change his holy, righteous decrees. He does best. Why should I pray at all?"

The Pulse of Spiritual Life

Prayer is the most uplifting influence that touches any soul. It drives away mists, clarifies vision, and brings into the soul the power that every human being needs. It is an inestimable privilege that a man may bow before his Maker and receive divine ennobling and enrichment. Prayer is the pulse of our spiritual life, the essence of religion. Without it, religion becomes mere ethics. As we pray, our outlook widens; our spirit of fellowship with our brother man increases; our sense of kinship with God and with his universe expands.

Public opinion is a wonderful force—the thoughts in the minds of many persons working together. Prayer is more mighty than that, for it concerns what is deeper and more vital. It is grounded in the heart of the universe and has its center in God.

So, although your perplexities about prayer are many, it may be the thing that you most need. Let us not lose this best of all powers for the development of personality. Let us follow the example of our Lord Jesus, who prayed, and thus let us cultivate the religious life.

"Speak to him, thou, for he hears, and spirit with spirit can meet. Closer is he than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet."

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topic for October 17 CRITICISMS OF YOUTH

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in "Young People's Leader," the official magazine "For All Baptist Young People." Subscriptions to the "Leader" may be made through the B.Y.P.U. of America, at $1 per year.)

It is nothing new—"criticisms of youth." It is characteristic of youth and adult relationships.

This is the first of twelve topics (one each month) on the problems young people face in applying the teachings of Jesus to their every-day life.

The "criticisms" suggested in the topic treatment in the Young People's Leader do not have to do with the complaints about the home, as to the difficulty of getting you out in the morning or the way in which you leave your room. The "criticisms" about which adults are talking and writing so much are youth's amusement and dress, its food and drink, its real interests in life.

These being such a vital part of life, why shouldn't they be talked about in the young people's meeting? Are the criticisms justified? What are the standards of measurement? What should young people do about it? These are questions which should be discussed in considering these "criticisms."

What is the best way to "get the topic across" in the meeting? The Leader makes several suggestions: an open forum discussion, a debate, or a mock trial. Any of these is good, but the debate or trial can perhaps be made the most interesting.

Why not make this "Open Night?" Invite the adults, the whole church. Tell them that they have done a lot of talking about young people. Now it is their turn to hear the young people state their side of the question. If you use the mock trial idea, you might rope off the back part of the room and have the adults sit there—the gallery, so to speak.

In any form of presentation, do not be abstract. Do not talk about young people in other communities, other cities, other lands. Talk about yourselves. Let your illustrations and examples be from your own community life.

It would be well not to forget two other suggestions of the writer in Young People's Leader, one about the devotional worship part of the meeting and one about not letting the meeting end without some decision.

The one to conduct the worship part of the meeting might be an older person who has an appreciation of and sympathy for youth. The last fifteen minutes might be used for this and could close with an opportunity for all young people who desire, to indicate by standing, or writing on a piece of paper, their promise to help by their daily conduct to lesson criticisms of youth.

Or the worship period might be in charge of seven young people. They could all come to the front of the room at the close and each take two minutes to present one of the "Consider, Listen, Pray" parts of the daily devotions accompanying the topic presentation in the Leader.

If the topic arouses real interest, as might be expected, do not hesitate to substitute a continued study of the topic for other topics suggested in the Leader. A helpful consideration of the topic might run over two or three meetings. In this connection, see "Talking It Over Together" in the Young People's Leader.

Worship Programs

Many a young person, new at the task of preparing programs, longs for some definite suggestions for leading a meeting. Although the Young People's Leader gives many good helps for the regular meetings, often there are special meetings, or the young people are asked to lead one of the Sunday-school departments. Then it is that a special program is wanted.

A set of good worship programs, centered around a special theme each month, is given in the International Journal of Religious Education. These programs suggest hymns, scripture, stories, etc., to be used, showing how each thing in the program has its place.

Take, for example, the programs suggested for August. The theme is forgiveness. The first Sunday centers around the thought "Realizing Our Faults." (The "Hymnal for American Youth" is used.)

Prelude: (Instrumental) "We Plough the Fields and Scatter," (Hymn No. 284, "Dresden.")

Hymn: "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind," No. 146.

Call to Worship: The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him.

Hymn: "O Jesus, Thou Art Standing," (first stanza) No. 133.

Responsive Reading: (May be copied on the blackboard.)

Leader: Father, we are young and full of life;

Assembly: May we not be overconfident.

Leader: Father, we wish to do great things;

Assembly: May we remember that pride goeth before a fall, and be humble in all our dealings.

Leader: Father, we would be leaders.

Assembly: May we first cast out the mote that is in our own eye; then shall we see more clearly to cast out the mote that is in our brother's eye.

Hymn: Second stanza, No. 133.

Story: (If possible hold up a large picture of "The Light of the World" by Holman Hunt as the following story of the painting is told.)

In this painting we find the very essence of the hymn we have been singing. Christ is standing at the door of the human heart. The door is indeed fast closed. The weeds have grown up high before it, and show that it has not been opened for some time. There are no signs of foot-prints outside. A bat has been startled from the vines overhead.

We can almost hear the knocking, gentle, but persistent, as Jesus stands there. He is dressed in kingly robes, but the crown of thorns and the scars on his hands tell of his suffering for us. How patiently he stands there! In his hand he is carrying a light which we are sure would dispel the gloom inside.

Perhaps the owner is satisfied with his life. If he but knew who was knocking, how gladly would he throw open the door! A beautiful orchard is outside, with golden apples lying at the very entrance.

There is no handle to the door; it must be opened from within.

Hymn: Third stanza, No. 133.

Scripture: Psalm 51:10-17.

Key verse: The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.

Prayer: Individual sentence prayers for humility; that we may know our failures; that we may trust in God.

Offering

Closing Hymn: "I Would Be True," No. 170.

Benediction: The Lord watch between me and thee, while we are absent one from another.

The program is not a jumble of unrelated parts. It is, rather, a program of coordinated parts, and one listening cannot but feel that it was prepared before it was put into action.

Perhaps these programs could be used as a basis for preparing the regular weekly young people's meetings, if the young people wish to have a definite line-up. Appropriate hymns and stories and scripture could be substituted for those given. The young people will feel that theirs is really a "Worship" program.

Faith Triumphant

In the Palace of Amuhia, by Florence Willingham Pickard. New York: Doran. $2 net.

A story of faith and love triumphing in a hostile environment. The scenes are laid in ancient Babylon during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. It is the period of the exile and Daniel is the outstanding Hebrew character. A dramatic narrative of faithful love comes to a tragic ending on the night that Darius the Mede sacked the city. The historic element of the novel is valuable.

Ancient Crafts in Modern Palestine

THE Palestine of today, for all its vaunted progress, is still primitive when it comes to the crafts. A visitor there today finds many conditions about as they were when Jesus lived there. A writer in the Mid-Week Pictorial gives this interesting picture of the intimate life of Palestine:

Despite the introduction of western ideas into Palestine the native industries are still carried on in the old ways with primitive tools and curiously antiquated methods, differing little from those practiced in the time of Christ. The native carpenter's shop as seen in Nazareth today has not changed materially since Jesus worked as a boy under the tuition of Joseph; the wooden plowshares, yokes and cradles and other articles and implements manufactured by the Arabs of the twentieth century are of the same pattern as those known to have been in use in the days of our Lord.

The native potter may be found in most villages turning his pots out of clay with the aid of a crude potter's wheel which he works with a foot treadle, leaving both his hands at liberty to mold the clay into shape. Here are made most of the domestic utensils of the village, the water jars in which the women still fetch the water from the wells, balancing the tall pitchers gracefully upon their heads. The earthenware lamps are also made by the potter, and these are used and still burned through the night in the native Arab dwellings. "Her candle goeth not out by night," says the scripture, for a house with no light at night means an empty house.

In Jerusalem one can witness beautiful silver filigree work by Yemenese Jews. This industry is said to have been started in Yemen, in southern Arabia, when the Israelites fled there after the destruction of the Jewish kingdom. This craft is passed on from father to son and it is extremely difficult for newcomers to enter their ranks. A jeweler in America would require many tools to produce the beautiful work done by these eastern silversmiths. They possess few tools, yet they turn out exceedingly fine and delicate work.

Glass-blowing is one of the most curious industries of Palestine. For hundreds, if not thousands, of years this craft has been carried on in the little town of Hebron in the Judean hills, and it has been noticed that the glass vessels made today are identical in form with the ancient glassware which has recently been excavated in various parts of Palestine, and which dates from the time of the Roman occupation.

The glass factories are bare sheds, in the center of which round brick furnaces are burning. In these caldrons colored molten glass bubbles and simmers. Half a dozen old Arabs clad in bright-hued cotton gowns and white turbans squat on the ground with blow-pipes in their mouths. A lump of glass of the consistency of hot toffee is taken from the caldron and placed on the end of a blow-pipe and in a few minutes it is blown into a large glass bubble, when it is pinched and molded into the shape of a bottle or vase by the aid of some metal tongs. Then it is nipped off from the rest of the glass with a pair of pinchers and immersed in a tank of water to cool and harden.

The weaving industry is one of the oldest in the country, for the Bedouins of today, who claim descent from Abraham's son Ishmael, weave their tents of goat and camel hair, which are similar to the "tents of Kedar," which we read of in the Bible. These brown tents are not only a picturesque sight in Palestine but are extremely practical, being waterproof and durable.

Bethlehem is the center of the souvenir trade, of which the mother-of-pearl work is perhaps the best known. The shells are found on the shores of the Red sea, whence they are brought to Bethlehem to be cut and polished and worked up into souvenirs. Both men and women work at this craft, and it is interesting to see the men sitting on the floor of the houses polishing the shells on the surface of a wet stone.

The Singing Life

MAKE me too brave to lie or be unkind,
Make me too understanding too to mind
The little hurts companions give and friends,
The careless hurts that no one quite intends.
Make me too thoughtful to hurt others so.
Help me to know
The inmost hearts of those for whom I care,
Their secret wishes, all the loads they bear,
That I may add my courage to their own.
May I make lonely folks feel less alone
And happier ones a little happier, yet
May I forget
What ought to be forgotten and recall Unfailing all
That ought to be recalled, each kindly thing,
Forgetting what might sting.
To all upon my way
Day after day
Let me be joy, be hope. Let my life sing.
—Mary Carolyn Davies, in the Postal.

The olive tree flourishes all over Palestine and the olive harvest is an important one. Bread and olives form the staple food of the country people, and we read in the Bible how Hiram's servants were paid in wheat and oil. An olive tree will yield at its best from ten to fifteen gallons of oil, and this has to be extracted from the olives after they are picked.

In the bazaars of the cities the copper-smiths may be seen beating sheets of brass and copper into shape and making cooking pots, trays, and water vessels. Sometimes boys of nine or ten years of age will be working at this craft by the side of their masters.

The shoemakers' shops are among the gayest in the towns, for the shoes which hang in strings from the ceilings are made of brightly colored leather. They are generally made of morocco leather: rams' skins dyed bright red for townfolk or left a natural color for the country people, though the latter wear shoes only on state occasions, preferring as a rule to travel barefoot. Green, blue, purple and yellow shoes are also made and in some parts of the country long riding boots with iron-tipped heels are popular, but these are worn only by men of some importance, whose servants follow on foot, carrying the ordinary shoes for their masters. Hence comes the allusion by John the Baptist: "Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear."

Constructive Toys

IN HIS plea for the boy, a poet in a lumberman's magazine gives a good suggestion:

*"Don't buy him a sword and a gun
Whose purpose on earth is to kill;
Don't teach him that murder is fun
Or something the bosom to thrill;
Don't send him to valley or hill
To slaughter the dove or the daw,
A lesson in youth to instill,
Just give him a hammer and saw."*

In some cases the suggestion can be carried out literally, for the hammer and saw are at hand ready for needed service. But the versatile home can find other adequate substitutes available. The camera and radio have been named as useful possessions for men in the making. At all events, we may be certain that training in the use of a gun almost certainly leads to the use of the gun some time when it will be harmful.

—From the Sunday-school Builder.

A poetically inclined minister said in a address: "A sermon may be found in every blade of grass." Seeing him mowing his lawn later on, a humorously inclined member of the minister's congregation remarked: "Well, sir, I see you're busy cutting your sermons short."

BOYS and Girls

Anchoring a Sunbeam with a Yellow Cord

BY MARGARET T. APPLGARTH

Chapter I

ORDINARILY we do not think of sunbeams as being good scholars. And indeed, this particular sunbeam only became a sunbeam after she began being a scholar. Before that she had been more like one continuous thunderclap after another.

"The child must be possessed of evil spirits, that's sure!" groaned her mother. "Nobody can do anything with her," moaned her brothers.

"Nobody wants to do anything with her," frowned her father. But there they were all wrong, for our missionary wanted to do something with her.

"I have come to town to start a school for girls," said she, "and this is one of the pupils I want."

"But she's no good at all," objected her father.

"She's a cross as two sticks," warned her mother.

"She's really impossible," sneered her brothers.

"No matter," smiled the missionary, "send her along! I'll just have to make the best of her crossness."

So Thunderclap went to school. It must be admitted that school was more or less of a joke in town, for everybody was quite sure that girls had no brains, so how could you teach them anything? Grown men smiled in their beards at this ridiculous white woman who had come to town announcing that she would make brown girls wise. Everybody knew that it could not be done! But of course you and I know that everybody was wrong. It could be done. And it was done. In case anybody ever had the least shadow of a doubt, all they had to do was to look at Thunderclap.

The first month she was so unruly because of the difficulty of sitting still that she exploded into thunder-claps whenever any one spoke to her. It took lots of patience to keep her in school. And of course she learned nothing at all, she simply wriggled and jiggled; although as a matter of fact she was noticing many new things, and the second month she fell in love with a slate. She and that slate could not be separated (except at the risk of a terrific thunderclap). She thought that the slate pencil screeched and squeaked in a lovely way, and it suddenly became fun to trace the funny little hooks and curves of writing on her slate, for every hook and curve had a name, so that when you put a certain hook beside a certain curve it meant something special—and that is the way the marvel of sentences caught hold of Thunderclap. She fell in love with sentences, too. It was the most surprising thing in the world to pick up a book, any book, and find it brimful of sentences. Sometimes she could read them, and sometimes she couldn't. Little smiles would begin rippling way back at her ears and come dancing around to her lips whenever she found one that could be spelled into sense. Of course the longer she stayed in school, the more sentences she could read; the more sentences she could read, the more she smiled; the more she smiled, the less of a thunderclap she was; until she was altogether a sunbeam. It took about six months; but it was worth the waiting! From morning till night not a scowl or a growl. It was the missionary who renamed her "Sunbeam," and loved her dearly.

The truth was that the white teacher had little white sisters and neices at home—darling, affectionate little mortals whom she longed with all her missionary heart to see. But of course there were 3000 miles of deep blue sea between America and India. So she did the next best thing and substituted little brown maidens for white sisters and white nieces—indeed, it was astonishing how little difference there was—and of them all, I think that the nearest and dearest was Sunbeam. Perhaps because she tried the hardest, changed the most, and loved the deepest.

In any case, everybody in town began to be proud of that school. Grown men smiled in their beards and said they would not have believed it, but wasn't it a miraculous sight to see girls reading as easily as the very pundits? They had not supposed it possible. Yet look at the girls! Just look at them! It was all very pleasant for the missionary to feel that her school was so popular; indeed, it was almost too popular, for the pupils were squeezed in so tightly that it was uncomfortably crowded. There was not another inch of room for any new pupils, and she used to wonder what in the world she would do if another girl should come begging to enter.

But alas! alas! little she guessed that it was going to be quite the other way around, and that instead of having one pupil extra she was going to have one pupil less. That would make room—but oh! She did not want that extra room; especially as that empty space belonged to little Sunbeam. She could not believe her eyes when she counted noses that Monday morning and Sunbeam's nose was not there to be counted!

"She is ill," thought the teacher, and made inquiries. But the other girls nudged one another, saying nothing, "For teacher will not like our news," they thought.

And Sunbeam did not like the news, either; although just at first, on that Monday morning, she had been thrilled and happy. For, when she got up, she found that the sand in the courtyard was decorated with chalk designs. "A festival of some sort," she said to herself. She was still more sure of this when her mother came in with a brand new sari: silk, it was! And red, it was!

Sunbeam giggled and smiled. "Don't I look too lovely in it?" she laughed, preening herself and thinking how pleased the teacher would be to see her so charmingly dressed. Her old school sari had been dreadfully faded, and often it was rather soiled, for sitting on the floor all day long is hard on clothes, of course. So she smoothed the brilliant silk with happy hands; then astonishments number three and four!—her mother actually began oiling her hair and looping necklaces around her neck, bracelets around her wrists, and anklets around her ankles.

"Dear me!" chuckled Sunbeam. "I'm just too grand for words. What can be going to happen?"

Well, it all came out soon enough—she was going to be married!

"Oh, but I don't want to be married, and I won't be married!" she gasped. "I'm going to school. Why, I'm not nearly through school yet. There are books and books and books that I haven't read yet."

"Tut! Tut!" stormed her mother, "who are you to say, 'I want to this' and 'I want to that'? You must do as your father bids you; you are plenty old enough to marry, and if we wait any longer it will be a positive disgrace to us all to have you around. You ought to have had a husband years ago, but you had such a cross, disagreeable reputation in town that your father couldn't find any one to want you. But now that you are suddenly so pleasant, and educated, too, he had no trouble at all in making quite a good match for you. So stand still, and let me put these rings on your toes."

"I don't want rings on my toes!" wailed Sunbeam, heartbroken. "I don't want any horrid old husband! Oh, I wish I hadn't improved a bit; I wish I were still cross and disagreeable so nobody would want me around! I won't get married—I won't! I won't! I've got to go to school. Why, mother, there's my own little place on the floor; it will be empty without me! Who's going to sit on my own little place if I'm not there? Who's going to read out of my book? I've just got to go to school, mother."

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

CHURCH ROPES OFF STREET FOR SERVICE

On the closing day of the daily vacation Bible school connected with the Baptist church of West Terre Haute, Ind., the church held a great service in the evening. There was no building in town large enough to take care of the crowd, so the town board told church members to rope off the street if they wished. The men of the church got busy and, when finished, the street was well and comfortably arranged with seats and lights. Between 500 and 600 people were present for the exercises.

This school was a venture of faith which turned out a great success. It was begun without a dime in sight and continued for three weeks with an enrollment of 210 and an average daily attendance of 159. The cost of the school amounted to $54.33, the teachers having given their services without charge. When the school was over, the church found that all bills were paid from contributions received and a balance of $7.50 remained.

PROGRESS AMONG MONTANA CHURCHES

The most recent issue of the Montana Baptist Convention Annual reports advance being made toward better church equipment in that state. The Havre church, with aid from the Home Mission Society, has a well improved plant for its growing Bible school and congregation. First church, Great Falls, has received a generous offer from the Home Mission Society which it hopes to be able to meet and so continue work on the first unit of a splendid edifice. The church at Missoula has purchased one of the most sightly and strategic locations for a new church in the whole city. A few Montana churches now being assisted by the mission fund have asked for less aid and others are increasing their mission quotas, so that as far as possible the majority of the churches are gradually coming to self-support. First church of Lewistown can now be numbered among the churches coming out from under convention assistance, and it is expected that others will be added during the coming year.

WYOMING LAYMEN ORGANIZE

Previous to the meeting of the Wyoming Baptist Convention at Thermopolis, Wyo., a group of laymen from Wyoming Baptist churches met there on the afternoon of June 15.

The meeting having been called to order, the chairman suggested that an organization of laymen connected with the Baptist churches of Wyoming be effected, with a view to branching out eventually into associational organizations and church units. In the discussion that followed, the idea was generally endorsed, leading to the appointment of a committee to bring in recommendations regarding the initiating of such an organization, the nominating of permanent officers, and the drafting of a provisional constitution. At a meeting on the following morning, the recommendations of this committee were adopted, and Mr. J. C. Rae of Gebo was elected president of the new organization for the coming year, and Mr. I. O. Wolford of Lander, secretary-treasurer.

The president will appoint one layman to act with himself and the secretary as a committee on the drafting of a provisional constitution, to be published in an early issue of the Wyoming Baptist Bulletin. It will serve as a working basis during the year and will be submitted for adoption at the next meeting of the organization, to be held in connection with the annual meeting of the Wyoming Baptist Convention.

This new group of laymen states as its primary purpose: "That we, laymen belonging to Baptist churches of Wyoming, constitute ourselves an organization for the utilizing of the forces of the laymen connected with the Baptist churches of the state, for the extension of the kingdom of God."

RAISING "A MILE OF PENNIES"

The East Side church of Evansville, Ind., Rev. A. C. Westphal, pastor, has chosen a unique method of raising money for its building fund. They are now engaged in a campaign to raise "a mile of pennies," and expect lots of fun and excitement along the way.

ONE WAY OF GETTING ATTENTION

Burma has a versatile Christian worker who finds many ways of getting his message before the people. Concerning him, Rev. C. E. Chaney writes: "He gets about his field in a Ford and has a chokra (little Indian boy) who goes with him. When they are about to pass some one on the road, the chokra tosses out a tract, then watches to see if it is picked up. Almost without fail it is picked up and read. Many of the readers are strolling Buddhist priests."

WHY NOT A "STANDARD CHURCH?"

A standard church! "Why not?" asks the department of missionary cooperation for Ohio in the Ohio Baptist. "We have standard young people's societies and standard organizations of all kinds. Why should we not expect and have a standard church? First church, Cambridge, Ohio, is working toward that end. It has a card printed with spaces to record attendance at Bible school, morning and evening Sunday attendance, prayer meeting, and also a place to indicate whether or not a contribution was made. The idea is to watch these records and endeavor by visitation and letter to bring all members up to the minimum standard. Other churches by following similar methods have brought the standard up. Lawrence, Kan., has a 97 per cent standard membership."

"The Cambridge Association in Ohio has endorsed the plan and an effort will be made to lift the membership of the churches in the whole association up to the standard. What a pity and what a loss to the individual and the kingdom that only 50 per cent of the members of Baptist churches attend worship and support even the local church work, and that only about 30 per cent give to benevolences!"

BAPTIST MISSIONARY HONORED

In recognition of his public service in India, the silver Kaisar-I-Hind medal was awarded to Missionary J. Herbert Cope in July. Mr. Cope is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania and of Rochester Theological seminary. He began his service in the Chin hills of Burma in 1908. During the last ten years he has carried alone the responsibility of church visitation in his large district. In addition to his duties as a missionary and considerable activity as a translator of parts of the Bible and of hymn books and text-books, he has been carrying on the work of honorary inspector of government schools. Mr. and Mrs. Cope and their son are now home on furlough.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGES

Significant of the way in which Christianity is breaking down ancient prejudice in the Orient is the following fact. In Kondapally, South India, is a Christian school, and at its head is a native Christian of low caste extraction. Nevertheless, he has four Brahmin teachers under him and is held in high respect by all the caste people of that section.

Among Ourselves

A Special Letter to Laymen

By P. C. WRIGHT

SOME pastors hesitate to present the work of the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board lest they appear to talk in their own interests. The board does not agree with this sentiment, because the work has to do with our ministry as a class, and even where it may be applied individually it relates to the office rather than to the man. The attitude of the pastors is in harmony with the unselfish spirit which characterizes their lives. The board urges them, however, to consider the relationship they hold in their official capacity. It is essential that the laymen know the problems and the policy of the board.

The board seeks to eliminate poverty from the old age of our pastors. The minister has been underpaid. While salaries have increased considerably in many churches during recent years, it still remains true that many churches have not increased the remuneration which they give the pastor, and in those cases where the salary has been enlarged the increase does not equal the advance in the cost of living. The situation of the ministers of our denomination, therefore, is worse from a financial point of view than it was formerly.

The board aids aged ministers and missionaries in their need. Such aid is being given to nearly 2000 at the present time. The appreciation of these old ministers is constantly expressed in the many letters that are coming to the office.

There is a better way to assist the aged ministers. Help them to prepare for their helpless years by a system of cooperation. This has been planned for the retiring pension fund.

The retiring pension fund plan of the board was adopted by the Northern Baptist Convention in 1920 and has since been in operation. At the present time there are 1806 members in the fund and 107 have already begun to draw their pensions. The board is pleased with the steady growth in the membership, but it is aware that many pastors who ought to become members, in view of their prospects of inadequate support later on, have not joined because they have felt unable to pay their share of the cost. The board is now paying 70 per cent of the cost after the first year of membership, hence the part paid by the pastor is not large. The difficulty for him comes in the payment of the cost in the first year.

The plan has been pronounced by many who are competent to judge as one of the best pension plans in existence, and the experience of the board in the operation of it during the past six years justifies its provisions.

The provision for the support of our ministers during their later years is a denominational responsibility. The poverty that has existed among them in past years, and which will be widely increased in the near future unless the workers are provided for, cannot be honorably permitted by the churches of the present day. Organized as our denomination is on the basis of a locally independent church, and having no standard of remuneration other than the ability of the local church to pay, the problem of support of the minister in his age may be most wisely handled through the cooperation of the local church with this board. The retiring pension fund plan is so arranged that the church assumes no obligation in the case of an individual pastor other than a voluntary one, and that lasting only from year to year and not beyond the duration of his pastorate. If the local church assumes responsibility for its cooperative share of the cost of the pastor's pension membership, it thereby pays its proportionate share of his support in old age.

It would be well for every board of deacons or board of trustees to appoint one of its number to inquire concerning this matter and secure full information about it. The Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board will gladly cooperate with any of these representatives.

It should be understood that the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board gains no profit by the increase in the membership of the retiring pension fund. Every new member is a liability rather than an asset. The board simply desires to accomplish the task set by the denomination to see that those who have unselfishly and worthily wrought a good work for Christ and his cause shall not die in want.

All correspondence relating to the work of the board should be addressed to the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board, 276 Fifth ave., New York, N. Y.

Swedish Baptist General Conference

By HENRY WINGBLADE

DELEGATES from Swedish Baptist churches in twenty states and Canada assembled in the Broadway church, Kansas City, Mo., Aug. 25-29, for annual conference. Although the church was without a pastor, as Dr. J. G. Oster had already moved to his new field in St. Paul, it was well organized and received the convention hospitably.

On Wednesday, before the opening of the convention proper, the ministerial association held its meeting. During two sessions, the high calling of the minister was emphasized by various brethren, and, when at the end of the afternoon address, Chairman J. H. Kallman suggested that the closing moments be spent in prayer and consecration, every person present went down on his knees. This prayer meeting, we believe, did much to bring about the spirit of peace and cooperation which characterized the entire convention.

The convention was formally opened Wednesday evening by the new moderator, Rev. Emil Friberg, of Seattle, just returned from a trip of observation and lecturing in Europe. After Supt. J. P. Jones of the Kansas City Baptist Union had given an address of hearty welcome, the convention preacher, Rev. Benet Erickson of Moline, Ill., appropriately and powerfully spoke on "An Ideal Conference."

On Thursday evening, Rev. Ernest Hall, who has worked as conference evangelist for several years, struck the high note of evangelism: "If we would truly progress, we must evangelize."

Friday evening was given over to the Diamond Jubilee program of the denomination. Pres. G. Arvid Hagstrom of Bethel institute was in charge and gave an illustrated lecture on the history of the Swedish Baptists of America since their founding in 1852. Portraits of early pioneers appearing from time to time on the canvas were applauded by the large audience. Doctor Hagstrom also reported on the favorable progress being made in the various states in the raising of the $350,000 jubilee fund for Bethel institute and for missions.

Saturday evening was occupied by foreign missions. Rev. Victor Hedberg of Chicago, in the absence of Dr. Frank Peterson, was in charge. The following

The Sabbath Bell

HARK! the deep-toned bell is calling,
Come, O come!
Weary ones, where'er you wander,
Come, O come!
Louder now and louder pealing,
On the heart that voice is stealing,
Come, nor longer roam.

Now, again its tones are pealing,
Come, O come!
In the sacred temple kneeling,
Seek thy home;
Come, and round the altar bending,
Love the place where God, descending,
Calls the spirit home.

Still the echoed voice is ringing,
Come, O come!
Every heart pure incense bringing,
Hither come!
Father, round thy footstool bending,
May our souls to heaven ascending,
Find in thee a home!

missionaries were introduced: Rev. and Mrs. A. E. Nelson of Brazil; Rev. and Mrs. Ivan Larson of China; Miss Lydia Magnuson of India; and Rev. and Mrs. G. A. Sword of Burma. Greetings were also read from other missionaries. Mr. Sword, who has spent seven years in Burma, was the principal speaker. He stirred all hearts as he told of the great mass movements and of the power of the gospel to transform individual lives in that darkened land.

Saturday noon the alumni of Bethel seminary held a reunion with Rev. Emil Friborg of Seattle, and Rev. O. L. Bjork of Sweden as the principal speakers. Both emphasized the need of careful intellectual training and continuous spiritual growth in the future ministers of our denomination.

The Saturday and Sunday afternoon sessions were given over to the young people. Saturday afternoon Rev. Emil Friborg spoke on "Why I believe in the inspiration of the Bible." After this helpful address Mr. Friborg answered questions. Sunday afternoon Dr. J. A. Klingberg of the New Britain orphans' home spoke on "Why I pray." Every one present felt that he knew from experience what he was talking about, and when Doctor Klingberg put the question to the audience as to how many wanted this coming year to be a real year of prayer, every person arose.

Reports of denominational work were encouraging. Rev. J. O. Backlund showed progress for the literary department. Dr. O. Hedeén told of the success in the home missions. Pres. G. A. Hagstrom spoke for Bethel institute, reporting increased attendance and a deep spirit of prayer which had prevailed especially during the last year. Dr. Karl J. Karlson was elected dean of Bethel seminary to succeed Dr. A. Gordh, who has resigned. Doctor Gordh has, however, consented to remain on the faculty, for which the conference expressed its appreciation.

Prof. Adolf Olson, speaking for the historical committee, reported the death during the past year of Rev. Eric J. Anderson, Grass Lake, Minn.; Ludwig Kjusstrom, Dalton, Mich.; Carl Haglund, St. Paul, Minn.; A. P. Hanson, Quincy, Mass.; L. E. Johnson, Minneapolis, Minn.; F. O. Nelson, Keyes, Calif.; C. Ostrom, Concordia, Kan.; C. E. Westin, Isanti, Minn.; and J. P. Zetterwall, Jamestown, N. Y.

Upon the recommendation of the specially appointed young people's committee, the conference created a young people's commission consisting of seven members—three ministers; three young people; and the young people's editor, ex-officio. The duties of this commission are to study the young people's problems and bring such help as it may to the young people's work.

Sunday morning Rev. F. Lindin of Chicago delivered a powerful message on "Our Divine Leader." In the evening the closing message was brought by Rev. Ellis Eklof of Stromsberg, Neb. on "Prayer and Fasting as the Secret of Power."

The Diamond Jubilee conference will be held in Chicago, Aug. 23-28, 1927, with all the Baptist churches of Chicago as hosts. The conference voted not to restrict the number of delegates for next year. Any member of a Swedish Baptist church may come as a delegate.

Dr. Karl J. Karlson of St. Paul was elected chairman for next year and Pres. G. A. Hagstrom, vice-chairman. Dr. Frank Peterson and Dr. Carl G. Lagergren were elected honorary chairmen.

North Dakota Notes

BY FRED E. STOCKTON

REV. H. M. Wyrick, pastor at Grand Forks, with his family spent his vacation in Tennessee visiting relatives. During Mr. Wyrick's absence the Grand Forks church was redecorated and painted. Mr. R. B. Griffith, one of the charter members, presented the church with a grand piano. A packed house greeted the pastor the first Sunday evening in September.

Miss Ethyl G. Mentzer of Cedar Falls, Iowa, has been employed as Baptist student worker at the state university at Grand Forks. The local church, the state convention and the board of education share in her support. She received her master's degree from Teachers' college, Columbia university, New York City, in June.

First church, Fargo, of which Dr. H. R. Best is pastor, is engaged in putting up the Sunday-school unit of its new plant. This unit together with the price of the lot will cost about $60,000. The contractors promise to have the building completed by Dec. 1.

MR. AND MRS. BENGT ANDERSON AND DAUGHTER JUNE

Calvary church, Fargo, under the leadership of Rev. C. W. Finwall, has purchased a new site on the north side on which it is planning to erect a church edifice in the near future.

Mr. A. K. Harper of Fairfield, Iowa, has been engaged by several of the Protestant churches of Fargo for a series of evangelistic meetings which opened Sept. 12. A large tabernacle has been erected by the churches for the campaign.

The Ellendale church extended a hearty call to O. H. Hallgrimson, a member of this year's graduating class of Northern Baptist seminary, which was accepted and Mr. Hallgrimson is now on the field. A council has been called by the church to meet at the state convention to examine Mr. Hallgrimson with a view to his ordination.

The work at Stanley has been reorganized. During the past year three special meetings have been held. Walter E. Benton, of the Northern Baptist seminary, who served the field as student pastor during the summer, has been called to remain as pastor during the year. Improvements were made on the Stanley property during the summer.

Reinhert J. Johnson from Kansas City seminary has been called as pastor of the Rutland Swedish church.

Cecil E. Wakelam, a member of this year's graduating class of the Northern Baptist seminary, is the new pastor at Calvin. Mr. Wakelam is a North Dakota man and was formerly a member of the Newport church.

Rev. Roscoe M. Bailey, after a year's leave of absence to attend the Kansas City seminary, has returned as pastor at Crystal and Grafton.

Rev. and Mrs. Bengt Anderson and their little daughter, June, sailed for New York for Assam Sept. 6. Mr. Anderson was formerly pastor of the Kulm church. He is a graduate of Bethel seminary, St. Paul. Mrs. Anderson is a graduate of Mounds Park School of Nursing, St. Paul. Mr. Anderson has a short but successful pastorate with the Kulm church. He leaves a host of Baptist friends in North Dakota who will follow him with prayers and best wishes as he enters upon his life of missionary service in Assam.

The South China Churches and Their New Vision

BY GEORGE H. WATERS

"YOUR young men shall see visions and your old men shall dream dreams; Pentecost was born in the new vision that came to old and young." With these words Dr. Kwen I. Tai, recently returned from over four years of postgraduate study in America, began the address which he gave before the second annual convention of the Ling Tong Baptist churches held at Swatow, July 20-23. "This is what happened a year ago," he said, thus referring to the 1922 convention when the Ling Tong (South China) churches made their declaration of autonomy; and then he proceeded to outline the essential factors in the new vision and to answer the question as to how they may become real.

The future will have its own story to tell as to the realization of this vision, but there are many readers of THE BAPTIST whose attention was attracted by the publicity given to the action of these churches a year ago who will want to know what progress has been made and how matters stand at the present date. In the light of this year's convention, which was preceded by the most largely attended and best preachers' institute we have ever had, the new movement is undimmed May 30 and the days following; this year, too. It is more intelligent, has a clearer understanding of its task, has wider support among the churches, is more truly constructive in outlook, and will prove more effectively organized during the coming year. Last year the convention met in an atmosphere charged with the nationalistic passions that were sweeping the country in reaction to the events of May 30 and the days following; this year while the spirit of Chinese initiative and responsibility for final decision was in no sense surrendered, the atmosphere was friendly, serious and sane.

The Workers' Retreat

The preachers' institute, or rather, church workers' retreat, before the convention, was of great value as a preparation for the later gathering. The enrolment, which was thoroughly representative of the five associations and all departments of the work of the mission, included about 110 Chinese workers, both men and women, and about twenty missionaries. The program, prepared and directed by the Chinese committee, was constructive in spirit, comprehensive in scope, and well balanced in its daily schedule which continued for practically one week. The program was heavier, but the interest was more sustained than in any similar gathering of past years. Each day a devotional period from 8:00-9:30 a.m. was followed by a Bible address given by Pastor Bau, the executive secretary of the Chekiang-Shanghai Baptist Association. Pastor Bau, coming as a recognized Chinese leader from another part of China, brought Bible messages helpful to fellow workers who are confronted with conditions and problems common to all Christian work in China today. The next session was devoted to an intensive study of concrete problems of church life: church government, centralized or local; Christian education in its relation to the Christian family, the non-Christian community and the anti-Christian movement; the needed leadership and how it shall be produced; problems of finance and church property; and finally, the problem of the church's spiritual life.

Each topic was introduced by an appointed speaker after which the assembly separated into four sections for a half-hour group discussion. Upon reassembling each group made its report of findings which, after further discussion, were coordinated in the form of suggestions to be submitted to the convention the following week. While there was some tendency to reach hasty conclusions on large and baffling questions, there was an educational value in this series of discussions in which over 100 Christian workers came to close grips with the outstanding problems of church life and administration. In the afternoons and evenings other addresses were given, with time for music and social diversion while five sessions were devoted to practical training in Sunday-school work and preaching.

Three missionaries had part in the program as arranged and in addition Dr. J. T. Proctor of Shanghai who happened to be present, spoke on invitation of the committee and made a strong appeal for the development of the local church as the vital unit in the program of Christ's kingdom. Owing to the fact that the summer assembly of the student Y. M. C. A. of this section of China was meeting at the same time in the buildings of the boys' academy, the workers' retreat had the privilege of hearing Mr. T. Z. Koo, student secretary of the national committee of the Y. M. C. A. and a Christian leader of international standing. In a manner impressive for its simplicity, Mr. Koo led the devotional session on Saturday morning and with a richly spiritual message on "Putting First Things First," carried the gathering to the peak of the week's program. The Christian world is richer for men such as he, whatever their tongue or race.

Problems

What of the convention itself and its new vision? As the program advanced it became evident that the convention was facing two groups of problems; on the one hand were questions related to its own internal life and organization, and on the other, those involving its relation to hostile influences in the government and in the nation at large. Having received repeated assurances during the year that our mission and the boards were prepared to cooperate heartily on the new basis, little time was given to readjustment as related to the foreigner. How should its own corporate life be developed and its united activities coordinated? To these the convention worked out certain definite replies. During the past year the new movement had been handicapped by having no executive secretary who was free to give full time to convention interests. Two plans were submitted: one for a convention headquarters in Swatow with a staff of secretaries similar to the staff of certain state conventions at home; the other for one executive secretary, with possibly an assistant, who should cooperate closely with the associational leaders in the five associations. The latter plan was adopted. A secretary was not elected during the convention session, but the matter was left with the executive committee; undoubtedly a choice will be made within a few weeks. It became clear that only as the central group of leaders work with and through the associational organizations will the goal be achieved.

In regard to educational work, the convention voted to return to the policy of limiting the proportion of students from non-Christian homes and stressing the claims of children from Christian families.

In regard to finding the needed leadership, there was a new emphasis on the development of church life and nurture, and an insistent call for the reopening of the theological seminary which has been closed for the past four years.

In the women's work the convention supported the aim of the leaders who plan that all departments of the work shall come under one united administrative control. The one tense moment in the whole two weeks occurred when this question was discussed. Only one woman was elected on the convention executive committee which was increased this year to eleven members. The decision was that in case the executive committee finds on investigation that the women's work in its entirety is placed under the administrative control of the Ling Tong convention and its committees, it shall be empowered to add two additional women members to the executive committee.

As to convention machinery, the Ling Tong Baptist Council, which corresponds to the board of a state convention at home, was changed to consist of fifty Chinese members, chosen proportionally from the five associations, together with the whole staff of missionaries who serve as advisory members without vote. Last year the council was composed of eighty members, fifteen of whom were missionaries. The membership of the council is distributed, Chinese and missionary alike, on the six standing committees: evangelistic, educational, medical and philanthropic, social service, women's work, finance. Separate boards of trustees were elected for the Swatow academy, the theological seminary, the girls' school (Kakchieh) the woman's school, and the two hospitals at Kakchieh and Kityang. Missionaries were chosen on all these boards except that of the boys' academy which omission was due to government regulation in Kuangtung province under the present regime.

A word must be said regarding finances. It cannot be denied that at this point the greatest disappointment of the year occurred. The delay in filling the office of executive secretary is one large factor in this situation. A year ago a splendid budget was adopted, covering the work of the several standing committees, but the one thing to do now is to reserve judgment and give the new movement another year to truly find itself.

Ordinations

THIS summer season has found some of our churches laying hands on their finest young men for the gospel ministry. July 2 there was an ordination council at Juda when approval was set on the pastor, Rev. Ralph Nordlund. Supt. A. Le Grand presided and gave the charge to the church. July 15 Cassville called a council for the ordination of its pastor, Rev. M. E. Campbell. Supt. Le Grand offered the ordaining prayer. These young men are both from the Northern seminary, Chicago, and are doing yeoman service in their respective churches while continuing their studies. Another Northern seminary man, W. H. Anderson of the Raymond church, was ordained by a council called by his home church Aug. 11. These three small churches have thus maintained the traditions of American church life in discovering young men of talent and calling them to the attention of the churches of a wider circle. What a thrilling story the sum total of that kind of work would make were it ever fully told! As in the days of other men, now become great, the little church is the friend and promoter of the young minister. Our larger churches are under lasting obligation to these rural and village churches. "Our templed hills" still echo with the call of our best ministers.

In addition, the Richland Center church has planned the ordination of its pastor, Rev. Floyd Knickerbocker, to take place at an early date.

Buildings

The Sheboygan church is happy in the moving and entire remodeling of its church in a new and better location.—The church at Sheboygan Falls, Rev. C. D. Mayhew, pastor, took the summer to completely renovate its church edifice and install a new furnace. The rededication service was held Sunday, Sept. 5, when Dr. A. LeGrand preached the sermon.

Pastors, Old and New

A pastor, the story is related, felt he ought to move. He found upon taking inventory that he would need a new suit, would have to get acquainted with a new parish and be nice to all kinds of people in his new church. So he decided to get the new suit, make the extra calls, be nice to the people and have the new church, right in the town where he lived, thus saving the expense and inconvenience of moving. How many pastors are "new" on their old fields we cannot say. The "change of address" registers the following actual changes. Rev. R. E. Fisher goes from Reedsburg to Antigo.—Rev. C. L. Randall becomes pastor at Silver Lake.—Rev. Ralph Spangler of Silver Lake becomes pastor at Marinette, First church. Mrs. Spangler was formerly Miss Nelson of the Italian work in Racine and Kenosha.—Rev. W. Alderton leaves Beaver Dam to become a professor in Union Theological seminary.—Rev. August Rohde begins as pastor of Sheboygan, German church, Sept. 1.—Rev. Arthur Woods leaves Berlin to become district representative of the Anti-Saloon League.—Rev. George F. Reichel of Swope Park church, Kansas City, becomes pastor of the Bay View church, Milwaukee.—The Big Bend church, which has had the services of the Methodist pastor from Waterford, has decided to have a pastor of its own. It will soon locate a man in this attractive village only a few minutes drive from Milwaukee.

We are sorry to report the serious illness of Rev. D. Raffone, veteran Italian Baptist pastor of Kenosha. His friends will pray for his recovery according to God's will. He is a great power for good among his people.—Mrs. Jeanette Lincoln, state worker, is convalescing in Mounds Park hospital, St. Paul, after a serious operation. The many churches where she has labored lovingly will pray for her speedy recovery.

The Associations

Reports are beginning to come in from the Baptist associations. Beginning with the Northern Association they are in full swing with good crowds, splendid spirit of cooperation and a fine state convention team in the field. Supt. A. LeGrand, Mrs. E. B. Lemon, Rev. G. C. Mitchell, director of evangelism, Rev. C. C. Browne, director of religious education and Rev. G. F. King of the American Indian work in Oklahoma comprise the team. Northern Wisconsin is virgin soil and our Baptist churches are growing in that region.

At its recent associational meeting the General Baptist Association recognized the new negro churches of Waukesha and Kenosha. Kenosha now has a Swedish, German, Italian, negro, and American white church.

If pastors or parents have young people entering the University of Wisconsin it would greatly help them and the Baptist workers there if they would communicate with Rev. C. Walter Smith, 429 No. Park ave., Madison, Wis. This will enable our student pastor to get into contact with them. We are well equipped to minister to the needs of our Baptist students at this important center.

Letter from India

By W. L. FERGUSON

THE weather is a good topic for conversation in August, especially this August, and in Madras, where conditions have been unseasonable. In the days of my youth, on a farm in America, I used to hear talk about the dog-days and the heat thereof; but they were only a circumstance to the heat we have been passing through for the past two months. Happily these days are past, and we are beginning to get an occasional sea breeze each day and night and to pass from a state of dripping wet to being simply uncomfortably moist. Let none mistake my meaning. I am not talking about the use of intoxicants, but about the weather, and that in the most sober fashion.

The political pot is boiling at a great rate. This observation fits in with the remarks about the weather. The first period of the reforms is drawing to a close. The legislative assembly and the various provincial councils have lived the term of life for which they were elected, and fresh elections must be held and the electors be given a chance to express their wills. The many obstructionist policies tried during the past five years have failed. Great promises were made by certain classes of politicians that if they were sent to the law-making bodies, government would have to yield. One by one, however, the efforts have failed. Swarajism, non-cooperation, absenteeism, coalitions and combinations made in the hope of bringing government to a standstill have all failed to achieve their purpose. At present there is a movement to bring about a regrouping under new leadership of those candidates who will pledge themselves to work for the success of a cooperative policy, a policy which will insure the obtaining of maximum benefits through utilizing the powers which now vest in the councils and assembly. This new grouping, if it comes about, may be the force which will save the day and insure the granting of larger powers in 1929 when the reforms are to be reconsidered. The new elections are less than three months distant. New issues must be found in order to make successful campaigns, for the results of the old issues are not such as to enable candidates "to point with pride" to the record made by the obstructionists. In Madras city, where a number of elections have been held for city councillors, the Swarajist candidates have been overwhelmed, and the non-Brahman, or justice party candidates chosen.

But politics have only a passing interest when compared with the deep, everyday concerns of life. The economic situation is most pressing now. Multitudes of people are out of work and can find none. They move from place to place in the hope that perseverance will win. It is hard to tell them that relief is impossible, that we have been facing this business depression for five years, and that missions are as hard hit as is business. A few days ago there appeared at my door a whole family, a man, his wife and five children, who had come from a distance. They were looking for work, he said, and had no home, no food, no employment. He offered to "convert and become a Christian, if I would make provision for him and his family, and to bring them all with him. When I questioned him about his knowledge of the Christian way, I found that he knew nothing of it, but was seeking a way out of his physical distress. One's sympathies are wrung dry these days in trying to deal with the hundreds of cases which come along—cases of real need. No, it is not a famine; it is after-the-war depression in commerce, and to some extent over-population, there being vastly more people than there is work. The way has been long since 1920-21 when these conditions began to be acute. The way ahead may be just as long!

Many Meetings

The past fortnight has been crowded with meetings. First came the annual session of the council for the missionary medical school for women, Vellore where a full day's consideration was given to problems of finance and administration. Progress is being made in the construction of several new buildings on the town site. The second story of the Cole dispensary is completed, and work on the administration block is proceeding. Plans for the operation block and the children's block are finished and have been approved by the government, together with the estimates. As rapidly as possible work will be put in hand.

The Madras Representative Christian Council held a three days' meeting. Members came from places far and near. The questions of evangelism and labor conditions were subjects of extended reports. Much attention has been given to these, and the committees are directed carry on for the next year. In the greater towns and cities of India industrialism of the western type is getting a foothold, with the introduction of machines and factories; the concern of the Christian forces is that these conditions shall be known and tackled before the laboring masses become a prey to greed, disease and neglect, and become alienated from the appeal of religion as was the case with workers in the West some years ago. What might not the churches of America have been spared if adequate attention to the workingman and his problems had been given from the start? Thanks to prohibition, the slum and the saloon have largely disappeared, and their concomitants of disease and poverty are vanishing. The votes of Christian men and women, with their prayers and labors, have made this new day. We want to have the same blessings in India and the world.

The educational council of South India, a missionary body, has also been in session. It has meetings twice a year and always commands a good attendance. Its work is done largely through committees between sessions; but the officers in Madras have much to do in dealing with the matters passed upon by the council. A deputation to the educational department of government is being returned in order to point out some of the difficulties which have been experienced in the working of the elementary education act of 1920, by which control of elementary schools was placed in the hands of local bodies. The tendency seems to be to force missions into a secondary place of influence, though it has long been recognized that their schools have been in the lead. A better presentation for missions is desired. Since their contributions to education are so large, they desire and deserve a proportionate voice in administering and working the new plans. The day is coming, however, when I believe we shall have to withdraw from the elementary educational field.

The reference committee of our Telugu mission held a six days' session at Bangalore. The chief problems discussed are how to find men and women to supply the actual and prospective needs of the stations and institutions, and how to provide a sufficient income to keep the work going, for at this meeting the committee had to reduce current appropriations by 8 per cent, in accordance with a decree of retrenchment following the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention in Washington. This makes 28 per cent reduction during the past four years! Our case is becoming desperate. I wonder how long the churches of the denomination will allow this condition to continue.

A House Party with a Mission

By EMMA K. HODGENS

UNDER the auspices of the woman's state society, Pennsylvania women held their first house party Aug. 3 at Bucknell college, Lewisburg, Pa. Sixty-seven women, representing seven associations and twenty-nine churches, were enrolled, with a few exceptions paying their own expenses. They were cordially welcomed by the Lewisburg women, led by Mrs. Rivenburg, chairman of Lewisburg hospitality committee, and every provision for their comfort and happiness was made by Mrs. Emory Hunt and Dean Clark of the university.

A program including study books, methods, denominational plans, missionary addresses and plays, Bible study, stereopticon views and social features, had been planned by Mrs. W. E. Chalmers, chairman of the program committee and dean of the conference.

The outstanding feature of the program was the two-hour period each day when the denominational program was presented by Miss Ina E. Burton, national promotional secretary. Helpful discussions on the various phases of women's work were led by Miss Burton.

Mrs. Joseph Wilds led in the study of "Moslem Women" and Mrs. W. E.

Chalmers in "Our Templed Hills." The golden anniversary address was given by Mrs. Thomas Sames. The presentation of various branches of state work, helpful Bible and devotional hours were conducted by the state officers and secretaries. The singing, led by Mrs. T. T. Richards of Scranton, was a popular feature of the program.

At the evening meetings Miss Winifred Roeder of Yachow, West China, brought missionary inspiration and information in her talks; a missionary play, "A Dream with a Mission," was dramatized by the Williamsport women and stereopticon views of Bucknell and China were shown.

Mrs. H. C. Hodgins, president of the woman's state society, was the house party hostess and presided at the sessions.

The missionary conference was voted a great success, and a request made that two similar conferences be held annually in different areas, making possible attendance from more associations in the state.

Here, There and Everywhere

PASTOR CARL E. NISSEN of the Baptist church at Barrington, Ill., begins the season with sermon studies on vital Christian topics, such as "The Church," and "How to Use the Bible."

REV. T. HARLEY MARSH at Decatur, Ill., opens the fall program with a "church night," occupying three hours with every minute full.

MR. ALLAN W. DOUGHTY has taken up his duties as director of activities at the First church, Joliet, Ill.

SAD NEWS COMES from Oregon. Benjamin Charles Goodwin, nineteen-year-old son of Pastor Alfred Goodwin of Veneta, Ore., was lost from the steamship Laurel and drowned off the west coast of Costa Rica, Aug. 19. He was a member of the Baptist church at Veneta.

WHILE PASTOR L. P. RUSSELL of First church, Vallejo, Calif., spent nine weeks in the Santa Cruz mountains, at his summer home, Azalea lodge, Rev. H. D. Zimmerman served the church acceptably as summer pastor. Mr. Zimmerman is now available for a regular pastorate.

FIRST CHURCH, Anderson, Ind., has nearly caught up with its missionary budget, and at the present rate of gain will pass it in another month.

MR. RICHARD V. CLEARWATERS was ordained to the ministry at First church, Spokane, Sept. 3. Rev. J. M. Nelson was moderator and Mrs. Nina Yeager, clerk. Other participants on the program were Dr. F. M. Bobo, Mr. Raymond Burch, and Revs. Owen T. Day, William Jackson, F. A. Huston, John Newton Garst, A. F. White and John R. George. Mr. Clearwaters returns to do school work in Chicago.

DR. CHARLES W. GILKEY of Hyde Park church, Chicago, preached for Park Avenue church, New York, Sept. 19.

HOME-COMING WAS OBSERVED at the Tabernacle church, Utica, N. Y., Sept. 12.

A MAN AND HIS WIFE attended the Church of the Redeemer six weeks before anybody spoke to them, they say. Now they are actively connected with the church in official positions. Which shows that a church's friendliness cannot be judged by a casual case, and that two Christians had a religion that could outlive a passing chill.

A Business Man Tells Why He Buys Annuities

A Massachusetts business man, recommending the ANNUITY PLAN of The American Baptist Home Mission Society, wrote in part as follows:

I have studied insurance company reports and find that many people fail financially after they are sixty or sixty-five years of age. The ANNUITY INVESTMENT saves you from such a calamity. There is everything in favor of the ANNUITY PLAN and not one thing against it.

A dollar invested in an ANNUITY will help you while you live and it will go on forever helping others.

What a great opportunity to do good! In short, it becomes a living, tangible asset. Sometime you expect to do something for benevolent and charitable organizations that need help. Why not do it now by investing in an ANNUITY? In my case it means a net of over seven per cent. After twelve years I know I did the right thing.

Cordially yours,

The building is fifty-eight by sixty-seven feet in dimension, brick and stone construction, with a seating capacity of 400. It is two stories, with a spacious assembly room below the auditorium. L. Baylor Pendleton was the architect and Wm. T. Smith and Sons were the contractors. Rev. W. H. Johnson of Hannibal and Mr. A. S. Coles, Third church, are helping Pastor Wm. Edwin Darrow in special evangelistic meeting. Mr. Coles is song leader.

Obituary

Mrs. Nannie Louise Barrett died Aug. 13 at Santa Rosa, Calif. She was born Feb. 7, 1849, at Belleville, Ill. She was baptized and united with the church at the age of fourteen. The family immigrated to New Albany, Kan., in 1867, where she was married in 1870 to Henry Clay Barrett, a veteran of the civil war, who died in 1909. She is survived by three sons: Ray W. Barrett of Torrence, Calif.; Rev. Roy H. Barrett of Reno, Nev.; Roe M. Barrett of Santa Rosa, Calif.; four grandchildren, and a sister, Mrs. Jos. Stallings, Coyville, Kan.

She had been a member of the Baptist churches at Nickerson and Hutchinson, Kan.; Central Los Angeles; Oxnard and Santa Rosa, Calif. Funeral services were conducted by her pastor, Rev. J. F. Blodgett, at Santa Rosa and the interment services by Rev. Guy Wimmer at Hutchinson, Kan.

Her life radiated a spirit of deep devotion to Christ. Her loyalty and love for her church were constant. Her neighborliness, untiring labor, and able leadership made her life one of high usefulness. Across the land a multitude rises up with her children and calls her blessed.

Rev. Norton Everett Chapman, born Sept. 27, 1858, at Byron, Mich., died Aug. 11 at Minneapolis, Minn. He was a graduate of Colgate university, receiving his M. A. degree from Franklin college. He held three pastorates in Minnesota, building one church structure; and two in Iowa. He taught Greek and mathematics in Grand Island, Neb., for one year, and for nearly seventeen years did agricultural extension work with the University of Minnesota. An accident in early manhood prevented his going as a missionary among the Karens, Burma, as he had planned. He is survived by his wife, and two sons: Prof. James E., North Dakota agricultural college faculty, and Dr. Roy N., chief of entomology division, University of Minnesota.

Rev. Frank S. Clark died Sept. 4 at Damariscotta Mills, Me., where he was born fifty-five years ago. He attended the institute in Chicago and the Southern Baptist Theological seminary, Louisville, Ky., and was ordained at Windsor, Me. He held pastorates at Windsor, and North Vassalboro, Me.; in Vermont; at Easton and Montville, Conn.; in Ohio; and at Greenville, R. I., where he was stricken with paralysis which resulted in his death. He also did missionary work in Northern Maine for three years and acted as agent for two years for the New England Home for Little Wanderers. He is survived by his wife and two children, Miriam and Philip. Funeral services at Damariscotta Mills were conducted by his brother-in-law, Dr. E. C. Whittemore.

Mrs. Margaret C. Dennis died Sept. 10 at Bradford, Pa. She was born in Ontario county, N. Y., in 1854 and was married to William H. Dennis in 1875. In 1877 they moved from Carbondale, Pa., to Bradford. Here they helped to revive the Baptist church, and were active in church work, Mr. Dennis being a deacon of First church. Besides her husband, Mrs. Dennis is survived by ten children, sixteen grandchildren and two sisters.

The Saving Sense

Henry Ford has denied the rumor that he intends to retire to a peaceful country cottage. Thanks to his efforts there is one.—Punch.

In a lecture on economics a professor in one of our universities called attention to the fact that in some parts of the country the number of men far exceeded the number of women, and added facetiously the suggestion that it might be a good plan for women to migrate to that part of the United States. A young woman seated near the front of the room, entered her protest against such a slur on her sex by ostentatiously leaving the room, but not in time to escape the lecturer's remark: "But I did not mean that it should be done immediately!"

He: "Did you ever hear the story of the Scotchman who wanted a good caddie, one that could find him a ball so that he could start his game?"

She: "No; tell it."

Neighbor: "How does it come that you're making a lawyer out of Si? At the time he was growing up you had him on having him a doctor."

Si's Father: "Yep, we did! But he was such a reckless lad we figured it'd be safer to have to take his law than his medicine."

"Look here, we were married, and divorced!" cried an angry bridegroom dashing into the newspaper office to waving the local sheet before the editor who read: "William Devork and Harriet Burke were yesterday untied in marriage."

SOUTHWEST CHURCH, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

THIS is station WCOY (We Count on You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, 2320 S. Michigan ave., Chicago, Ill.

"'Good Things Ahead' is a sample of the snappy headlines in church bulletins this time of the year. And it's true as gospel. It would make a dandy slogan for THE BAPTIST. Our readers will not be disappointed in its contents during the months just ahead.

"A member of the Crow tribe of Indians living in Montana wrote the field editor the other day and closed, 'With kindest regards from us all and hoping that our moccasins will dent the snows of a hundred winters, I am, yours for the Worthville Trail,' etc. He is a real Absoroke and has been a subscriber to THE BAPTIST for many years. Says he enjoys it 'heap big.' Of course he has left the wrong path for the 'Jesus Road.' Peace, good-will and THE BAPTIST seem to go all together.

"The First church of Toledo, Ohio, has a club for the paper. That gives it the year rate. Why pay $2.50 a year for a paper when it can be had for every cent at $2 by simply securing a list equal to 10 per cent of the resident membership? Help your pastor or agent to complete the list. Copies sent to your public library, Y. M. C. A. and to friends count on the 10 per cent.

"Southern Baptists, in increasing numbers, depend on THE BAPTIST for news in the field of the Northern Baptist Convention. This week F. Barr Brown of Missouri, writes: 'Enclosed find $8 to pay my subscription and set it ahead. We appreciate the paper very much.' Thank you, Brother Brown. Come again.

"And a pastor, Rev. C. M. Thompson of Barbourville, Ky., says: 'Enclosed find for two years.' We look forward to the coming of THE BAPTIST every week. It keeps us in touch with the things in the North in a fine way. No paper surpasses it as a gatherer of news for the entire Northern Convention.' We appreciate these fine unsolicited testimonials. Every week we are cheered by the hearty greetings of brethren in the Southland.

"Rev. H. A. Welch of Smith Center, Kan., is a man after our heart. He sends this $3 for THE BAPTIST and Missions, (how can any pastor get along without it?) and then asks for samples that he may enlist his people. He is a wise elder-shepherd. He knows the value of the larger vision and fellowship created in contact with the work of the brethren around the world. It creates a world consciousness. May he achieve unusual success for his Master.

"Here is a brother from the Hoosier state who thinks the paper is fair. J. L. Wade of Oakland City, Ind., in renewing his subscription writes: 'Your paper is maintaining a high standard and I am impressed that you are trying to treat all elements within the churches fairly. The assistant editor has the faculty of putting current events in a nutshell.' Well, the assistant editor is a Hoosier too.

"Here we are! Another big debate starts up out West. On Sept. 5 in the first church of Oakland, Calif., Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, Sr., and Rev. J. Whitcomb Brougher, Jr., held a 'fool' debate. The question was, 'Resolved that Young Fool is a Bigger Fool than an Old Fool.' We do not know who won but we should like to see a debate staged in every church in our convention on this question, 'Resolved that any member of the Northern Baptist Convention who does not subscribe for THE BAPTIST needs a friend to show him the more excellent way.' Who will volunteer for this service?

"John Andrew Holmes has said that it is well to remember that the entire population of the universe, with one trifling exception, is composed of others. The regular reading of a good religious paper might enlarge our sympathies for the mass of strugglers and aid us in adjusting our lives to them in such a fashion that the qualifying word, 'trifling,' might well be omitted. Think it over.

"A word in the ear of the PASTOR! Let your people know about the World Mission. Hang the announcement of it where they can't fail to see it. You'll find it on the back page of this issue—the last the best of all the game!

"WCOY now signs off. Hinderer or helper? Good night."

A class was asked in a Sunday-school examination to give the meaning of the word "Selah." "Please, sir," said a lad,

"that's what David used to say whenever he broke one of the strings on his harp!"

Within the limits of greater London, England, there are 228 Baptist churches, with a membership of 57,222, and church property costing about $1,310,000, the Baptist Banner tells us.

James Baird quotes from John Watson (Ian McLaren) in the British the following significant message written twenty years ago: "When God is pleased to send his new prophet, one expects that he will preach the gospel of social deliverance; that the white female slaves, who sew from morning till night and half through the night, and hardly get wherewithal to keep soul and body together, should be delivered from their bondage; that every laborer who is willing and temperate should have his living wage wherewith to keep himself and his family, and every citizen of Britain, however humble, should have his own little home wherein to live in peace and comfort; that the countryman should not be evicted from the land to make room for wild animals and rich men's sport; that the owners of unsanitary property should be punished and not compensated; that temptation should not be placed at every street corner in the way of the poor and miserable; that every man should have free access to education, to the country, to health and just enjoyment; and that the burden of weariness and sickness and

"Copec" will visit America. At least an organizer for it, Miss Lucy Gardner, will come. She will lecture in New York, Boston, New Haven, Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, Vassar college, Mt. Holyoke college, and other places. "Copec" is a British movement to promote a "Christian order in politics, economics and citizenship." Miss Gardner comes at the invitation of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the churches.

Attention is called to a periodical of more than ordinary significance and value. It is the Chinese Recorder, published at Shanghai by associated missionaries of different denominations. For careful, incisive, far-seeing, statesmanlike interpretations of current conditions, tendencies, causes, issues, programs of action, and outlooks in China, it has no superior. Has it an equal? It is mentioned here as a service to the readers of THE BAPTIST. It is issued monthly at $3 per year. Thousands of Christians ought to make it selected reading. Such a course may save future blunders and bloodshed. Observations in THE BAPTIST upon affairs in China are largely influenced by light gathered from the intelligent staff of the Chinese Recorder.

A significant advance is being made in the practical work of the University of Chicago divinity school. Three new men have been appointed on the staff. Dr. Charles W. Gilkey will assume the work in preaching, giving two hours a week throughout the year. He continues his ministry in the Hyde Park church. Prof. Walter C. Bower becomes professor of religious education in place of Prof. J. A. Artman who has accepted the general secretaryship of the religious education association. Professor Bower is an acknowledged leader in his field as evidenced by his position as chairman of the committee on curriculum of the international council and his recent book "The Curriculum of Religious Education." Dr. Ernest J. Chave comes from the pastorate of the First Baptist church, Sioux Falls, S. D., to become assistant professor of religious education. He took his doctorate at the University of Chicago in 1921 and has since had a position of educational leadership in the Sunday-school work of South Dakota. His book, "The Junior" is the most careful study that has been made of older childhood. Prof. Theodore G. Soares remains head of the department and will give his entire time to religious education. Professor Holman in pastoral duties, Professor Baker in missions and Professor Edwards in public speaking complete a corps of seven men in practical work. In addition, the Chicago Theological seminary has Professors Davis and Patton in preaching; Professor Eastman in English and dramatics; Professor Ward in religious education, and Professor Holt in social ethics. There are thus in the combined faculties twelve men giving the work which a generation ago was in the hands of one. This emphasis upon fitting the candidate for the practical work of the ministry is a sign of theological progress.

Editor's Notes on the Lesson for October 10

THE REPORTS OF THE SPIES

Lesson Text: Num. 13:21-33. Golden Text: Num. 13:30

Temporizing Majorities

Kadesh-Barnes spelled opportunity.

Ten out of twelve make a strong majority. In a jury when ten stand together the other two usually yield. But in the case the jury was hopelessly divided. The majority stood for postponement, the minority urged immediate action. Ideally the minority was right, practically the majority was wise. The ten men who pled for delay probably knew the temper of their people, and therefore were unwilling to risk defeat and disaster for the whole enterprise by agreeing with the minority to take a plunge into a situation so beset with difficulties. Due credit has not been accorded these ten men whose discretion outran their courage, and idealists, as all Christians should be, have continued to boost the stock of Joshua and Caleb, the minority spies. Time has also cast its shadow upon these ten cautious men who recommended delay in entering Canaan, because the farther we get away from a situation the less we are able to appreciate the difficulties. Majorities are not always so cautious. They often rush into impossible situations from the sheer force of numbers. But on the whole the tendency is to maintain the status quo. The majority born in the nineteenth century cannot appreciate the abandon and recklessness of the minority born in the twentieth century. That is in large part the key to the young people's problem.

Venturesome Minorities

Both the discretionary majority and the aggressive minority are needed. But the brakes must not be too large for the engine and weight of the motor car. In the case of the spies the brakes were set, and froze on any possibility of advancement. The energy and courage of the two venturesome spies who pled for progress were almost lost in the mob psychology of retreat. But the fine thing about Joshua and Caleb was their determination to stick to their report and make the people go forward if possible. It takes courage of a high order to insist that a thing can be done when almost everybody is agreed that it cannot be done; and that courage is greatly heightened when bodily violence is threatened against the insistent minority. But slavery came to end in America in the course of time because a minority for years refused to compromise with the traffic. The American saloon is a thing of the past through the heroic work of a few women originally who formed the nucleus of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. The League of Nations is not popular in America. Comparatively few Americans have the temerity to advocate it. But if this minority has the courage of its convictions and keeps up the fight who knows but that sooner than any of us expect the League of Nations will ultimately function with all the harmony and success of the United States of America.

Can an Evolutionist Be a Christian?, by W. Lee Rector. Boston: The Stratford Company. $2.50.

Quiet Talks on the Crisis and After, by S. D. Gordon. New York: Revell. $1.25.

A master spokesman for the premillarian brethren, Doctor Gordon gathers in five packed chapters the crises of old Testament history, the ripening present crisis, and indicates how, according to old and New Testament prophecy these events will culminate. His four indelible marks of the present culminating crisis are: power without restraint, lack of spiritual discernment, earthquakes, and the renationalization of the Jew. All civilization has broken down throughout its structure, and Doctor Gordon, broken hearted, confidently expects "the" crisis, the return of our Lord during this generation. A thought-provoking study in Doctor Gordon's "quiet talk" style.

The Psalms, translated by J. M. Powis Smith. The University of Chicago Press.

The volume is beautifully bound in red cloth and the Psalms are printed in fine readable type and in poetic form. There is no attempt to crowd the pages. A wide margin on either side of each page with the psalm in the center gives the reader a comfortable feeling as he reads. Doctor Smith is very happy in the titles he has given to the Psalms. He tells in the preface that his translation is an attempt to bring the Psalms down to the level of the mythical "man on the street." Therefore the translator has had in mind while at work on the translation the conservation of the classical rendering of the King James version. Doctor Smith's translation does not offend the tastes of those who have committed to memory many of the Psalms in the form in which they are found in the old version and who have learned to love these masterpieces of English literature. Where a change of rendering is necessary to bring out the original thought, the translator has not hesitated to make the change. "Down to old age" is the rendering of the last clause of the much-loved Twenty-Third Psalm. This will be somewhat of a shock to those who like the familiar and smooth climax, "And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." The Christian idea of immortality is not developed in the Psalms, and the translator had this in mind when he made the psalmist say, "And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord down to old age." THE BAPTIST plans to publish with the permission of the publisher a few of the Psalms as translated by Professor Smith.

Early Baptist Pioneers and Missionaries, Vol. II, by W. S. Stewart. Philadelphia: Judson Press. $1.50 net.

A book which tells how John Oncken pioneered for Baptist faith in Germany and other European countries in the face of Lutheran persecution; how Luther Rice, built a new American Baptist consciousness, founded George Washington university at Washington, D. C. (then Columbia college), financed the Judsons in Burma, all the time toiling like a Trojan among the churches as the first field representative of Baptists in America.

"Rice traveled in his own two-wheeled buggy. He was always on the go. He astonished his brethren with the rapidity of his movements, and the sureness with which he made his appointments." Nathan Brown, Henrietta H. Shuck, William Ashmore, Alfred Saker, Matthew T. Yates, Marilla B. Ingalls and Josiah N. Cushing complete the list of short biographies. These stories if told in the churches should take the "sag" out of our missionary giving.

The New Japanese Womanhood, by Allen K. Faust. New York: Doran. $1.50.

The new woman is appearing in the Orient and the author believes, upon evidence which he presents, that she will have a large part in the regeneration of Japan, for which, though sensing the difficulties and dangers, he has great hope. The new industrial situation is considered and amply described as also the peril and hindrance of the geisha and such. Education is the source of hope. The author affirms, that in his twenty-five years' residence there the condition of woman in Japan changed as much as "it took Europe 400 years to bring about."

Folks, Facts and Opinion

Detroiters awoke one recent Sunday morning to find in their morning papers announcements of meetings of thirty-three congregations of Spiritualists in the city.

Another strong argument for the settlement of the coal strike in England is the report that overseas shipments of American coal in August amounted to nearly three million tons. Every ton means more poverty in England.

Evangelism is promoted in a unique way by the program of the Illinois State Convention. This theme is expected to run through the whole program and will be developed in its various phases by some of the ablest speakers in the country.

A technique for survey of a local home mission field has been prepared by Secy. Frank A. Smith and adopted by the American Baptist Home Mission Society. It is well organized and seems to cover the whole range of information needed for wise decisions regarding the selection of fields.

News reports from Mexico state that the proposals of the Catholic church were defeated in the national congress by a vote of 170 to 1, and that the church has turned again to the boycott as a means of forcing the government to acquiesce in its demands. But the Mexican government states officially that the boycott is having little effect on the economic life of the people.

Existing organizations of Baptist women and young people doing a world work will be invited to organic membership in the Baptist World Alliance, it was decided at the last meeting of the executive committee. At the same meeting the proposal of Doctor Mullins for the preparation of a Baptist film was enthusiastically approved and two committees on editing and on finance for the project appointed. It was decided to arrange for the celebration of the tercentenary of John Bunyan in connection with the meeting of the alliance in Toronto in 1928.

What may prove to be a turning point to a new day of growth and usefulness for the Baptist Missionary Training school, the institution founded and maintained by the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society in the city of Chicago, was the formal inauguration of Miss Alice Brimson as president of the school Sept. 28. About 200 friends of the school and of Miss Brimson sat at the tables for dinner at 6:00 p. m., where they were delightfully and graciously served by the girls of the school. They then repaired to the chapel for the formal program. In the necessary absence of Mrs. George W. Coleman, president of the society,

Mrs. George Caleb Moor of Brooklyn, vice-president, introduced Mrs. John Nuveen as presiding officer of the occasion. Mrs. John Chapman and Mrs. Moor led devotions. A message of congratulation was read from Mrs. Clara Pinkham, former president of the school. Dr. Louis Lieserman, dean of the Presbyterian training school spoke for cooperation and said: "It will be easy to live and work with Doctor Brimson." Pres. Geo. W. Taft of the Northern Baptist Theological seminary, voiced congratulations on behalf of the Baptist denomination. Dean Shailer Mathews of the divinity school of the University of Chicago quaintly and humorously sketched the new day for woman in the affairs of the world and the work of the kingdom. Dr. Frank W. Padelford with the main address of the evening, gave a glowing tribute to the preeminence of the teacher in civilization. President Brimson, called up and personally congratulated by Mrs. Moor, responded to the group of preceding addresses with a clear, graceful and inspiring statement of her vision for the training school. Especially impressive was her tribute to the teachers and students of the school. A striking feature of the program was a song to their alma mater by forty students arranged in two rows in front of the platform. At one point Miss Hanna Sears, a graduate of the school in 1885, was introduced and applauded. The evening closed with a reception by the new president in the parlors of the building.

At the last Yom Kippur it is reported that attendance at the Jewish synagogues throughout the country broke all previous records.

Tangier controls the entrance to the Mediterranean. Who shall control it is in question. France, Spain and England are called into conference about it and the United States is not invited. Some Americans choose to feel that this country has been snubbed. Is it our business? Whom do we invite to consider the control of the Caribbean sea and the gulf of Mexico?

The World Conference on Faith and Order to be held at Lausanne next August will use the utmost care not to commit the conference or any of its agencies beforehand to any pronouncement or suggestion for or against the ultimate findings of the conference. The continuation committee in reply to a request from Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke on behalf of the Baptists has made it plain that no restriction will be imposed upon any group to prevent it from expressing its own point of view or from giving to the public its own findings.

Omens of encouragement are noted by the Florida Baptist Witness, thus: "A year ago it was all agitation and you scarcely heard anything except evolution. We have now turned our attention to other matters and what has been the result? We venture in the first place that there have been five additions to the churches this year for every one last year. In addition thereto we have the comparative figures before us showing receipts of the foreign mission board from May until September of each year. Last year during that period the board received $168,000. This year it received $211,000. Just a difference of $43,000 with which to send the gospel to the ends of the earth."

For the World Conference on Faith and Order eighty-seven nation-wide autonomous churches have appointed co-operating commissions to arrange for and conduct the conference. The communions officially represented include Anglican, Armenian, Baptist, Christian Congregational, Czechoslovak, Disciples Eastern Orthodox, Friends, German Evangelical, Lutheran, Methodist, Old Catholic, Presbyterian, Reformed, South Indian United, United Brethren and United Church of Canada. The churches represented are in the United States, Canada, the British Isles, Germany, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Greece, Serbia, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Latvia, Roumania, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, China, Japan, India, South Africa, Australia, and New Zealand.

South Carolina Baptists are considering a plan for the organization of a mutual insurance company for the insurance of church buildings.

The first interracial conference of church women promoted by national organizations was held at Eagle's Mere, Ark., Pa., Sept. 21-22. Invitations were sent to both white and negro organizations. All parts of the country were included and speakers represented both races.

Southern Baptists seem to be facing the question whether they will be able to continue to cooperate through a central commission as they have done since the beginning of their great unified campaign. Three or four states have indicated that they will no longer contribute the expense of maintaining offices for the commission on cooperation.

More than one-half, nearly 54 per cent, be exact, of all boy scout troops in the United States are affiliated with or sponsored by churches or church organizations. In emphasizing this relationship, the national council of the boy scouts, at its sixteenth annual meeting, reaffirmed its pledge "to encourage reverence and faithfulness to religious obligations and respect for the convictions of others in matters of custom and religion, and to discourage any activities which might tend to interfere with attendance at religious services"; and expressed its appreciation of the cordial support which the churches of America are affording.

Not through golden aphorisms or polished articles of belief, but through the medium of history and dialog and poetry and drama did God reveal himself," declares Gordon Poter in the Baptist Courier. "In the incidents of the patriarchal history, in the story of the Jewish kingdom, in the fervid utterances of the prophets, in the intercourse of the sanctuary of one who in the guise of a Galilean workman hid the majesty of Almighty God—thus were men allowed to gather for themselves their ideas of God and of his will for man. The books of the Bible are the records of his gradual revelation, moral and spiritual, of the people of Israel, and his revelation of himself through them to the world outside."

Herbert Stewart, commissioner of labor statistics, United States department of labor, definitely puts to rest the wet argument that American labor desires a modification of the prohibition act. In a letter to Mrs. Ella A. Boole, national president of the W. C. T. U., he indicates clearly that American workmen were losing their taste for liquor even before prohibition; and that the labor leader and brewery affiliations who attempts to divert American labor to the wets will be unsuccessful. Milk in enormous quantities began to be used in place of beer by the workmen in the overheated steel and iron mills and glass works before prohibition, the substitution by workmen of milk in place of beer resulted in doubling the going value of the American dairy industry.

To Rev. Frank H. Levering, veteran missionary at Kotagiri, Nilgiri District, India, acknowledgment is due for a copy of the annual report of the Telugu Baptist mission for 1925. It contains review letters from all of the local fields in the mission, covering a territory about the size of the state of Illinois. A directory of the missionary workers appears on the first page, and there is a pathos in it. So many of the names were familiar a generation ago. Will the denomination never again be able to send a full corps of young reinforcements?

From sixteen localities in Siberia come reports of 410 recent baptisms. A brother Tschigaleitschik tells a stirring story of a trip to the far north where the czar's exiles used to be sent, of hard traveling in a pioneer region through floods and storms and ice, and of finding at Tschaineck and other out of the way places steadfast groups of New Testament believers. It is like missionary work in the dark ages, but it is winning the people. At Beloserka, where the people are destitute and near starvation, he says that fifty-two offered themselves for baptism.

Indians are on the increase. In the United States they number 349,595, showing a gain of 16,585 over ten years ago.

Caterpillars were destroying the coconut groves in the Fiji islands. In the Malay states a fly was found which killed such caterpillars. It was introduced into Fiji and is killing the caterpillars there. Its name ought to be fatal to them when they hear it—Ptychomya Remota.

One divorce to five marriages is the rate in California, and one to seven in Kansas. There were 55,080 marriages performed and 10,623 divorces granted in California during 1925, according to the marriage and divorce report on that state prepared by the department of commerce. This compares with 55,677 marriages and 11,258 divorces in 1924. During the year there were 20,867 marriages performed and 3540 divorces granted in Kansas, as compared with 21,170 marriages and 3434 divorces in 1924.

In response to inquiries, Dr. J. C. Massee sums up his conception of the proper procedure for the six months' campaign of evangelism in the one call, "Preach Christ," with singleness of purpose, clearness, earnestness, love, patience, understanding and loyalty to his truth. He would have the whole denomination concentrate its collective and personal efforts, using all available opportunities upon such evangelism, to the subordination or exclusion of every other denominational interest which might impair the efficiency of this effort.

The Congregationalist suggests that the religious world needs a man "who can state the truths of religion in modern terms in such a way as to command the respect of modernists and fundamentalists alike." Not merely one, but thousands of such men are needed. A good many ministers can so state the gospel now. The thing is not difficult. The requirements are the experience of God's grace, the spirit of Jesus, an understanding of the gospel, a true historical and scientific perspective, an appreciation of the respective points of view of the modernist and the fundamentalist, and a reasonable degree of critical common sense.

The gap between religion and industry is bridged by Dr. William J. Hutchins, president of Berea college, in this form: "Any religion, to claim the attention of industry, must engage itself not so much to save us from the fires of hell as to abolish hell here and now. In this day the producers of the world cannot be satisfied to call that religion which consists merely of the dedication of money to deity, or in sweet words offered to God. We sometimes talk as if the truly Christian man is bound to fail in business. I am more often impressed by the fact that a man fails in this so-called crooked world because he is crooked himself. It is clear that you cannot run some industries and be true to the facts of faith. I think it entirely possible that a man in industry who wakes to the facts of faith may go to the wall. But do we not exaggerate the dangers?"

Jerusalem is becoming a modern municipality. It is now receiving its water supply from springs 270 meters below the level of the sea. The water is pumped to reservoirs 835 meters above sea level.

Every eighth school child has some serious defect of vision, is an announcement of the national committee for the prevention of blindness.

A huge German cannon was placed on the courthouse lawn in Hampshire county, Mass. Nine local clergymen protest publicly. They complain that "this horrible object is placed on the site of the first Christian sanctuary in this city." They compare it with "the ancient custom of displaying on a city's gateposts the heads of vanquished foes."

Zadi was a sick, emaciated baby, picked up by the wayside six years ago. Her mother was one of a large number of Armenian women deported from their homes in Turkey. Zadi was taken to a Near East Relief hospital, and later the American physician who saved her life and brought her back to health adopted her and brought her to America. In many cities this year Zadi will tell the story of the thousands of orphans in the Near East, and will ask that they be remembered on Golden Rule Sunday, Dec. 5.

Northfield schools founded by D. L. Moody, report an enrolment of 1100 for the regular fall term.

Hot-dog stands must go. So the American Automobile Association has resolved. The reason assigned is that they clutter up the scenery, and make the roadways unsightly. Hence a campaign is under way to clean them up or clean them out.

Southern Baptists are alarmed about the lack of missionary support among their people and the falling off of receipts. They sense the approach of disaster and are sounding the alarm. Northern Baptists owe them fraternal understanding, sympathy, prayers and an inspiring example. Their perils and their triumphs are ours.

Dr. F. B. Meyer, long known throughout the world as the great evangelical British Baptist preacher and expositor, is spending some time in the United States. His engagements cover the following places and dates: Sept. 5-10, the City chapel, Newark, N. J.; 12-17 North Shore Congregational church, Chicago; 19-24, Moody Bible institute, Chicago; 26-Oct. 1, National Bible institute, New York City; 3-8, Gospel tabernacle, New York City; 10-15, Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, N. Y.; 17-22, West End Presbyterian church, New York City.

Basil M. Manly, director of the People's Legislative Service, has addressed to President Coolidge, to various religious organizations, and to influential senators an indictment of certain federal officers in the government of Alaska that reads like a sketch of Gehenna. He accuses them of responsibility for the existence of bootlegging, dope peddling, vice, crime and several other varieties of judicial malfeasance. He more than intimates they have been retained in office after the president was informed of the record. What truth there may be in the story, and how far it ties up with complaints of lack of energy at Washington in the enforcement of prohibition, is a subject for further inquiry.

The average weekly attendance at motion picture theaters in 1925 was ninety million persons, according to Zion's Herald, and news reels, depicting current events, are seen by fifty-one million people each week. Production costs of American films are $150,000,000 annually, while the studio salaries amount to $60,000,000 a year, and the number of permanent employees of the industry is 235,000. Listed shares of motion picture companies total 11,331,394, held by 59,157 persons. The export business in films increased from thirty-two million linear feet in 1913 to 235,000,000 in 1925. Twenty-five thousand miles of films are shown in the United States daily; 823 "feature" pictures were made last year, in addition to 20,150 short subjects.

A Tangled Trinity

RELIGION, science and philosophy constitute a trinity of knowledge, about which people talk with the confidence of wisdom, with evidence of confusion, arriving at sorts of wrong conclusions and with intellectual and spiritual damage. Everybody has to deal more or less with this trinity under conditions in which a clear understanding is vital, and it would seem that there ought to be some method by which the ordinary person of common sense may find his way around under such conditions without stumbling, breaking his bones, talking nonsense, or wrecking his peace of mind.

Counsels of avoidance help little and may work harm. One such counsel is to keep science, philosophy, and religion separate. When dealing with science we are advised to be exclusively scientific; when dealing with religion, to be exclusively religious. And as to philosophy, safety inates, we are told, the recommendation of the experienced German farmer with regard to the polecat: "Well, it's better you don't handle him much". The difficulty with such advice is that it will not work. One naturally puts all of his religion into his science and all of his science into his religion, and all of both into his philosophy. Another such counsel is to stick to science and let philosophy and religion go hang, but that is to bar science from its vast field of fact and to deprive it of all fundamental reason and value. A third counsel is to postpone religion until one has clarified his knowledge in science and philosophy, but that involves indefinite postponement of life's highest essentials, for one's knowledge of science and philosophy are never fully cleared. If one is ever religious he must be so in the light of imperfect knowledge. A fourth form of the principle of avoidance is to stick to your religion—emphatically your religion—no matter what science and philosophy may say, but this policy leads easily into prejudice, obscurantism and superstition. One cannot escape from himself. If the mind runs at all it tends to run whole. It can distinguish differences in both the subject and method of its activity, but it cannot shut itself out from itself.

Of course one can be irreligiously scientific, unscientifically religious, and philosophically neither scientific nor religious, but only partially so in any of these cases, and then only when these several aspects of knowledge are specially defined for the purpose of making such distinctions seem valid. But if they be defined without metaphysical hair-splitting as they stand in simple and common experience—science being the mind's quest of actual facts, philosophy its quest of ultimate principles, and religion its quest of the best life—they are as inseparable as the three sides of a triangle. So conceived, they disentangle themselves easily from the maze of discussion about the conflict between religion and learning.

Each element of this threefold quest derives its validity from its association with the other two. For people of religious predilection it is easy to see that learning which rejects religion is crippled learning. Since it seeks to realize its pleasures and benefits apart from the best life, it has become a barren and vain pursuit in which the farther one goes the more hopelessly he is lost, even in his own intellectual world. He possesses some contents of knowledge without any determinate value or goal. On the other hand if it were possible to isolate religious experience from all knowledge of fact and from all rationality, the result would be to reduce both faith and hope to mere sentimental whim and emotional agitation. Religion enriches science. Science gives substance and certainty to religion. Philosophy finds ground and a goal for both. If it is error for the scientist to erect barriers to faith, it is tragic for the preacher to set up in his people a fear of scientific discovery and a suspicion that the devil hides behind a search for facts.

All truth is God's truth, and it is as sacred and authoritative tive at one point as at any other. The universe is his original and timeless book. The Bible is his Holy Word of Life in terms of significant religious experience. See what science did for religion when it discovered the radio. It remains to be seen what religion will do with the radio as a carrier for the gospel. See also what philosophy has done for science by the Copernican system of astronomy. See what religion has done for both science and philosophy by the Christian revelation of God as a personal Father having universal and redemptive competency and purpose. And finally, see how in the widest range of advancing experiment and in the increasing enrichment of human life, these three march in splendor side by side and arm in arm, to a common goal. If future experience shall clarify any of these it will enrich the others.

Inter-checking is a valuable service which science, philosophy, and religion render to one another. The quest for truth in one of these fields finds guidance and help from discoveries in both of the others, and the validity of our conclusions in one must be tested by ascertained verities in the others. Thus, the validity of a religious experience or of a doctrine must be tested not merely by its impression on the mind of the individual but also by its subjection to the test of a scientific method of investigation, by its practical results in life, and by its fitness to serve as an interpretation of God. Or any theory of the universe must test itself by the account which it takes of the actual facts of religion. Christ has cosmic significance. No belief in any field which shrinks from such cross-testing and from checking up against indications of truth in the other fields, can be accepted as finally true.

Push a balanced quest. Let science discover and devise all it can that has value in the light of critical common sense. Let philosophy go as far as the human mind is able to travel in making all human knowledge and human experience reasonable. Let religion release all of the capacity of human nature for idealizing, for spiritual stimulus, and for social fellowship wherever personality exists. Thus we shall find this whole trinity of science, philosophy and religion radiant with the luminous revelation of God, warm with his love and unified in his presence.

Six Hundred Feet above Sea Level

MORE than seven years ago the vision of the denomination took on a far perspective in the clear air of Colorado, and at the Northern Convention held in Denver in 1919 a five-year program was launched which promised unprecedented progress for the kingdom of God in the world. But the vision was never fully realized. We need not enter into the causes for the tardiness of the denomination to translate into actual accomplishments all the objectives adopted at Denver. The seven years since that epoch-making convention have been years of adjustment. No new machine put in motion for the first time runs perfectly. Improvements and adjustments are imperative before the various parts function without excessive friction and unnecessary noise. This has been true of the cooperative movement of Northern Baptists. But now the organizations of the denomination which cooperate in the unified program appear to be working smoothly and functioning in all their parts without lost motion or waste of power.

At the meeting of the Board of Cooperation held in Chicago during the last few days of September the fact just stated was apparent. Experience and statesmanship on the part of our leaders under the guidance of the Spirit of God have wrought wonders. Cooperation is now the assured method of denominational work. And it is cooperation with the emphasis on the first syllable. When fifty-eight distinct denominational organizations through their official representatives can sit in conference during six consecutive days and work out together the individual problems of each organization and the common problems of all and come to unanimous and enthusiastic decisions, then no further evidence is needed to prove that the machinery is properly geared and all the parts harmoniously adjusted. Advancement was in the air. The imperative call of the new day, the commanding challenge of unparalleled opportunity for missionary and evangelistic work, the insistent demand for better equipment, especially in growing suburban areas, were heard with sympathy; and in an atmosphere charged with prayer and with the faith which prayer inspires, a million dollars was added to the budget of benevolences for the year beginning May 1, 1927.

It is one thing, however, for the Board of Cooperation and its affiliated organizations to plan for advancement and quite another thing for the pastors and churches to catch the vision and keep step with the leaders. The best laid plans often have broken down and the highest enthusiasms frequently have been dissipated through lack of close connection between the individual members of the churches and what has come to be known as denominational headquarters. If the members of the local churches knew the facts as the leaders of the denomination know them, advancement would be imperative all along the line and the spirit necessary to advancement would soon appear. In order to bring this knowledge to the families and to the individuals who constitute the membership of our churches, and with a view to arousing their enthusiasm for the missionary work of the denomination, a unique and highly interesting plan has been evolved. It is a world tour worked out with all the details necessary to the success of any world tour, with the exception of actual travel. The thirty-one days of next January will be taken to make the tour. Bookings for the tour will be open during November and December. Churches will register for as many tickets for the tour as they can prevail upon members to take. The tickets will be in coupon form and each coupon will contain a number of salient facts in tabloid form about the missionary, evangelistic, educational, social and philanthropic work of the denomination. The facts will girdle the world. The idea is to read and discuss the facts in families and in groups as they appear on the ticket each day. The plan will be thoroughly organized and records kept of the number of people who take the world tour and follow it through to the end. At the close of the tour every local church which has followed the plan faithfully will be well prepared to face the missionary budget with confidence that the missionary quota allotted to it will be fully subscribed. From all indications it appears that the denomination has started again to climb, and if the advancement herein recorded can be projected at a 600 feet altitude, what may we hope to see in a city a mile high when the denomination in the near future meets again in Denver?

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

Locarno Is a Signal of Hope for a World's Peace

Five nations joined in the Locarno agreement have registered their treaties with the League of Nations, and these treaties are now properly public documents. The heart of the whole system of agreements is that between France and Germany, pledging them mutually not to resort to war for the solution of difficulties between them, establishing a neutral zone along the Rhine across which neither will move except at the call of the League of Nations, and committing them to arbitration of all disputes. Already France is withdrawing troops from German territory, and taking steps to reduce her own military establishment. Europe may yet become the world's light-bearer in the path of peace.

Mr. Oswald Huncke Has Troubles of His Own

Boxing, alias prize-fighting, is authorized in Chicago by virtue of a city referendum taken last spring and by authority of an athletic commission, of which Oswald Huncke is chairman. He is disgusted with his job. "Life has been made wretched" for him, "by the bombardment of politicians, the scheming of crooks, the threats of gentlemen who are experts in the art of bumping-off." Mr. Huncke threatens to resign. The Chicago Post, one of the morally respectable dailies of the country, remarks: "We cannot blame Mr. Huncke if he has become weary of his job. His experience will be repeated by any honest man who tries to fill his shoes. Commercialized boxing is in the mire. The prize fight cannot be made respectable." Well, the answer—not to the Post which has been right on the subject from the first, but to those who may be surprised at the developments—is, "What did you expect?"

This Distinction India Shows Herself Just Human

J. E. Chute in the Canadian Baptist emphasizes the lesson that "India wants Christ but not Christianity." The distinction is valid but not clear. True Christianity is the personal and social embodiment in practical living of the spirit and teaching of Christ. Does anybody want Christ without such living? Not sincerely and intelligently. But India's objection, presumably, lies against a Christianity that is not like Christ. If so, the objection is valid not only in India but everywhere. Sincere and intelligent followers of Jesus always deplore a Christianity that is not Christian. Perhaps the distinction is as clear to Indians as to Americans, and no more so. And Indians, like Americans, detect and detest a sham Christianity.

Are Americans Weary of Clearing About Those Debts?

If so, try to imagine the state of mind among the people of Europe, for they are the debtors. To us the debts are annoyance, to those people a continuous and dreadful nightmare. An observer no less competent than Mr. Frank Simonds analyzes the situation and concludes that with the economics and the psychology of the case require the release of the debts. It has long passed the possibility of a gracious and friendly concession; it has now and hereafter become a necessity behind which looms possibly the shadow of war. One of the most perfect haters of a creditor—is a debtor morally convinced of the iniquity of the debt. Precisely that is the growing state of mind of Europe. By an act of grace it was possible once to have created a regenerated, united, and disarmed Europe. Possibly by excessive postponement we may create a united, armed and furious Europe. Of course there is an American side to the argument. If Europe does not pay those debts, American taxpayers must pay them—to American lenders. Then, will Europe borrow the money again from those lenders, find herself still in debt to America, and pile up more hate? There is a devils' dance in this problem, and somebody will have to pay the cost of ending it.

Vinegar Never Catches Flies and Boorishness Wins No Friends

Why do the people of foreign countries hate America? The question is becoming a chorus. Upon one answer there seems to be general agreement: coarseness and bad manners of a considerable class of American tourists have the same effect upon sensitive, sensible and cultured people abroad that coarseness and bad manners have at home. It is nauseating and disgusting to those who observe such an attitude. President Coolidge has seen fit to lecture globe-trotting boors about their offensive behavior. His memorandum is equivalent to an apology to the world for some Americans who have money enough for travel but not sense enough for decorum.

Do the Churches Stand Here, or Is It Merely That They Ought?

Mr. James Myers wrote, and many papers printed, one of the clearest Labor day messages hitherto given to the public in the name of the churches. He names the things the churches stand for in industry as follows: reciprocity of service; the supremacy of service rather than the profit motive; the conception of ownership as a social trust; the safeguarding of youth; the protection of the leisure of men and women; full educational opportunity for all; a minimum comfort wage; insured employment; the equal right to organize. The whole reads like the manifesto of a new social order. We seem to be rapidly approaching the time when the churches will be able to substitute for the historic communist manifesto of Marx and Engels, the community manifesto of Jesus for a Christian, efficient, cooperative, democratic and fraternal community life.

Moving Picture Producers Challenge the Public

An increasing sensitiveness to moral protest is an encouraging symptom. The incorporated Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, composed of twenty-three operating companies, with Mr. Will H. Hays as president, reproduces an article by William J. Reilly which is a definite and not defiant, or discourteous challenge to the public for the morals of the screen. He says: "I should like to have a consensus from the public The screen is not the property of the film industry. It belongs to the public My expectations and those of all the producing organizations are worthless if the public does not accept the good and refuse the poor. The question, then, is not 'What can we expect from the motion picture next year?' but 'What can we expect from the public next year?'" The challenge is fair. Let the public speak. And let it speak in its own way without official interference on the part of representatives of the industry. Cash receipts at the office are only one of its ways of speaking. The screen does belong to the public. The intelligent public is reasonable and welcomes every effort to clean the screen from the inside. But clean it must be, or the public will ultimately take it under effective control.

The Miracles of Christ in the Light of Science

Christ came to harmonize man with God; the miracles called attention to realities in the spiritual realm.

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

UNTIL the birth of modern science, "miracles" were regarded as an essential part of Christianity. The appeal to them was an integral element in all Christian teaching from the days of the apostles to the middle of the nineteenth century. And then, gradually, a change came. Doubt began to creep into the minds of many who vehemently announced themselves as Christians while claiming the right to question the literal truth of the Gospel narratives. This process has developed until at the present time there is a widespread opinion that belief in miracles is a "burden to faith," and that "spiritual Christianity" would be better without them. Some would discard them altogether, others seek to reduce them or to interpret them in ways which empty them entirely of their former content. Still others, and perhaps the greater number, are in a state of mental confusion and seek relief in avoiding the subject altogether.

The causes of the change are various. First, men have fallen under the empire of physical science. The old idea of caprice has yielded to the modern idea of an orderly world. The "reign of law" is regarded as now quite established. There can be no place, so it is said, for any divine "interference" in a system of things which is rigorously conditioned by invariable "laws." Science knows nothing of the supernatural; it knows only the natural and how the natural functions. How then, can we find a place for a "miracle" which is assumed to be a contravention of law?

Secondly, men have entered into a fuller knowledge of the religions of the world, of which there are many. The last five decades in particular have contributed more to our understanding of universal religious beliefs and practices from the dawn of history onward than all the previous centuries. Miracles accompany every religious movement at least in its earliest stages. Portents and prodigies are multiplied. Priests and mystery men appear as the mediums and guardians of great and wonderful happenings. These wonders, it is said, arise naturally out of primitive man's love for the marvelous joined to his ignorance of natural laws. Imagination transforms misunderstood natural forces and gives to them a supernatural appearance. Legend enters and completes the story. The gospel miracles, it is therefore concluded, belong to this order and must be regarded accordingly.

A New Attitude

Thirdly, experience has played its part in creating a new attitude toward miracles. "Miracles do not happen now," said Matthew Arnold, therefore they never did happen. We see no dead raised, no water turned into wine, no sudden quelling of the tempest, no miraculous healing of the sick. With us, diseases run their course, lepers rot and die. Since nothing of a miraculous nature occurs in our time, why should we be compelled to believe that it occurred in the first century?

In this situation we ought to do some clear thinking. It was never more necessary than today since uncertainty always brings paralysis. Let us then, courageously face this subject of miracles as it bears upon our Christian faith. We must have some delimitation of territory for our occupation: let the line be drawn here. We shall not wander into the vast and appalling field of "miracle" as it concerns primitive peoples; or discuss "miracle" as a whole save as it bears upon our main theme. We approach the matter as it concerns our Christian faith and we confine ourselves to the miracles of Christ as these alone have consequence for us.

We begin, then, with the fundamental question: What was our Lord's own attitude toward these mighty works of which the Gospels preserve the record and which we name "miracles?" Here, the four Gospels may be put in as evidence since upon the special point before us, they entirely concur.

There can be no doubt that Jesus appealed to his "works" as signs and evidences of his mission. In an unchallenged passage he claimed that his works, wrought by the Spirit of God, were evidence that the kingdom of God had "come upon" that people (Matt. 12:28). "The works that I do bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me" (John 5:36). And Nicodemus spake for the best conscience of the people when he recognized Christ as a teacher come from God "for no man can do the signs that thou doest except God be with him" (John 3:2). The point need not be elaborated. It would be unthinkable that our Lord could make for himself the claim that he did, without, at the same time offering in some practical and demonstrative way evidence of the validity of that claim. And there was nothing blasphemous, but everything rational, in the demand made of him, "What sign shovest thou?" We ourselves who believe in Christ first did so and continue to do so because of the "signs" he gives to us that he is indeed the Saviour of the world. Otherwise what do we mean when we speak of "Christian experience?"

Seeking after Signs

It is also clear that our Lord did not place his greatest emphasis upon these outward signs of which we speak under the name of "miracles." On the contrary, he emphatically discouraged the seeking after signs. "He sighed deeply in his spirit and said, 'Why doth the generation seek a sign?'" (Mark 8:12.) Again and again he imposed silence upon the subjects of his healing mercy. When the crowd flocked to him, drawn by his benevolence in feeding the hungry, he exposed the low motive which assembled them, and reproached them for not penetrating the inner meaning of his action (John 6:26). And in one great utterance he told the world that if it refused to walk by the light of truth, it would not be convinced though one rose from the dead (Luke 16:31), a word especially appropriate in these days when so many are finding in Spiritualism a substitute for the gospel of Christ. The return to life from the dead is the climax of miracle yet our Lord declared it to be lower in grade than the word of divine truth which appeals to the conscience rather than to the sense of the marvelous. In point of fact, the mighty works of Christ himself failed to convince those whose minds were filled with inveterate prejudice and whose hearts were poisoned with hatred of the good. "Although he had done so many mighty works before them yet they believed not on him" (John 12:37). They never got beyond the signs. The thing he meant to signify was hidden from them.

It is clear that our Lord's emphasis fell upon men spiritual insight and obedience as their way to knowledge and salvation; and that he reproached mere signmongers and charged them with moral denseness: "Ye know how to discern the face of the heaven, but ye cannot discern the signs of the times" (Matt. 16:3). Clever at forecast ing the weather, they were dull at understanding the meaning of the events which were then crowding upon them and it is to these that our Lord refers them, bidding them in these to see the hand and hear the voice of God. A tremendous principle is here. Vast numbers of people, like the Pharisees, are looking for God in the exceptional and missing him in the ordinary things of life. They can believe he is in the lightning but not in the light; in miraculous recovery from disease but not in the splendid maintenance of health; in a blinding epiphany from heaven, but not in the silent leavening of the lump; in startling answers to prayers but not in the secret strength which comes to the soul without observation; in a dramatic conversion but not in the soft and gradual opening of the spirit to Christ. And all such need to be reminded that if they fail to discern God in common life, no sign from heaven will convince them of his presence, any more than Christ, who was the greatest sign from heaven, convinced the Pharisees. Our Lord placed the primary emphasis elsewhere. He insisted on a spiritual correspondence with God as the condition of that certainty which the miraculous sign is supposed to bring. "If any man will to do his will, he shall know" (John 7:17). "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice" (John 19:37). The real sign, the enduring sign, authentic for him who possesses it, is within. The evidence for God in the last analysis must be personal and within one's own soul. A historic story, however possible, however probable, however well authenticated, can never be personally tested as can a direct experience of God. The Christian does not believe that he who wears Christ's yoke finds rest for his soul, or that he who wholly trusts Christ is saved from sin and unto righteousness, simply because he finds this in the New Testament as the report of what our Lord said; he believes it because in his own experience he knows it to be personally true. The Christian life is born of and sustained by personal relations with a personal Saviour. Christ lives in us by his present life and not only in virtue of a word spoken two millenniums ago. The truth of that word is assured, not simply because it is reported, but because it is a living word effective in our lives today.

It is in this light that we must read the story of the miracles of our Lord. It is the only true way of reading them. It is the psychological way. It is the way of life. The first disciples were not drawn to Jesus by the miracles he wrought, but by his person. They who first knew him for what he was in himself were the very people who recorded his miracles. But the miracles to them were secondary to himself. They did not believe in him because of them, but in them because of him. And so is it ever. The miracles of Christ were never wrought for Pharisees and they never understood them. Their race never will. It is idle to waste breath on them.

No Self-Saving Miracles

Another important thing to observe is that our Lord trusted to no miracle for his own deliverance from difficult situations. Once for all he settled that principle in the great temptation. The way that he took was harmonious with that principle. He would not employ any power of God in any other than a divine way. Fidelity to that principle led him to the cross, but he never shrank from it. At the cross he was deserted and upon his holy soul fell the shadow of great darkness, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Yet he trusted and triumphed and breathed out his spirit with confidence. "Into thy hands I commend my spirit." A miracle might have been wrought. But he refused the aid of a miracle and chose the suffering by which the world has been redeemed. That way we too must tread if we would become, in the fullest sense, his disciples.

Is there a real and important place for the miracles of Christ? Critics of the miracles of our Lord proceed upon the assumption that "nature" is nothing more than the sum-total of the physical forces of the universe; that it is a closed system, purely material, that it cannot be interfered with. This, roughly put, is at the bottom of that thinking which repudiates the miracles. It may not express itself in this brutal way, but that is, in effect, what it comes to.

The Soul of the Universe

Such an assumption is entirely wrong and wholly out of date. It is not in line with the best scientific and philosophic thought of the time. It takes no note of the marvelous discoveries which have destroyed the supremacy of the atom and have compelled belief in the spiritual foundation of all things. No wise Christian believes in anything like a capricious interference with nature. But he does believe that nature contains infinitely more than man has yet discovered in it. Further he does not believe in God being an "interferer" in his own world. He believes God is in the universe. God continues to work in the world. The universe is not a dead concern like an engine run by a Mechanician who has made it but is totally different from it. It is a living universe. It bears all the marks of life. And the soul of it is the living God. We have to believe that nature as man knows it and nature as God knows it may be very different. For man is only of yesterday and he has slowly been groping his way to an understanding of the universe in which he lives. Often baffled, often taking the wrong way and compelled to retrace his steps, continually correcting and enlarging his findings, he has not yet arrived at anything like a complete understanding of the forces of nature. But he knows now that he is no longer the prisoner of matter. His experience has taught him that. He can combine forces, displace and rearrange them. He can produce entirely new effects by means of new combinations. By means of his instruments—creations of his mind—he can pierce mountains, conquer the air, liberate his thought to the end of the earth in a second of time. He is a worker of what his ancestors would regard as miracles could they return and behold him at work. His mastery of matter is due to his mind. Matter, once his master, is now his servant. The spiritual and the mental have overcome the physical. But all this has been wrought within the bounds of law. No new laws have been set in operation. No natural laws have been transgressed. All that has happened is the discovery of what has been there all through the story, but which is now for the first time understood and applied.

Further, not only can man effect changes in the world without by means of his mind; he can by the very same means effect equally great changes within himself. He has come at length to understand that mental states affect, in the most powerful way, for good or evil, his physical condition. The mental attitude can induce all kinds of physical disorders or, contrarywise, cure many of them. All this is beyond dispute and so well known that it would be idle to enlarge upon the matter.

Man can do this, and he alone can do it, upon this earth, because to him alone has been given the mandate to "subdue and replenish the earth". It is not in virtue of his physical origin that this power belongs to him, but solely in virtue of the fact that he is akin to God.

Now if this progressive mastery of matter by means of mind is an established fact within the sphere of this world, shall we deny a similar operation in the larger universe? Shall we admit the freedom of mind here and deny it there? If so, by what right? It is not only reasonable but compulsory that we believe in the supremacy of mind and spirit in the universe as a whole. But since the earth is an integral part of the universe we cannot in our thought segregate it as an entity and treat it as a closed cask impervious to the influence of what presses upon it from the whole. Not only can our mind, within its limitations, effect changes in material substances without ever going beyond the stern boundaries of law; the larger Mind must also be able to do the same but in greater degree and over a wider area. And if that Mind is friendly toward us, desires our complete good, and provides for our perfect health, may we not conclude that it will, if necessary, make rearrangements which, while expressing law and order, transcend the common or known working of that law?

This exactly is the Christian position. It declares our Lord to be "the One from heaven" sent by the Father into our world for the purpose of redeeming it. In himself he realized the ideal of the Son as master of the lower material of the world. He came to harmonize man with God. The main proof of his claim was himself. He possessed the harmony. He did always the things that pleased the Father. But he offered to men "works" to match his claim. These works were not for his benefit but for ours.

Being a Missionary

BY H. B. BENNINGHOFF

IT IS always difficult to be a missionary of any kind. So many conflicting things are expected of one. His countrymen expect him to be a good American. Trade follows the flag, so he must at least speak a good word for the interests that support him and follow him. Besides he is the representative of western civilization, and so must exemplify its virtues and gain sympathy for its noble, humanitarian ideas.

The especial agency which sent him to the field is a missionary board. Behind the board is a great denomination. This body has a venerable history, and the faith of the fathers must never be overlooked. In fact its teachings and organization are an essential and permanent contribution to the salvation of the world, and due emphasis must be placed on this peculiar contribution.

The people among whom the missionary is working have something to say also. Their civilization is so old that the date of the signing of the Declaration of Independence is only day before yesterday in their imagination. "What does this upstart of an American mean by coming over here to teach us? Our gods are older than his Christ, and most of his teachings are a rehash of what we can find in our classics." Americans are already paying huge sums for the art objects of our shrines and temples, and thousands of Americans are annually paying highest praise to our architecture, our art, and our scenery."

The coming of a missionary to his field raises questions and incites criticism. Occidental civilization has done nothing but exploit the Orient and with its wealth seeks ever to appropriate its treasures. "Money will do everything, and all Americans think that they are justified in doing anything that money will enable them to do, though it deprives our temples of their pictures and other sacred objects, and devastates our treasure houses."

Then, too, the missionary himself has a conscience. He has been called of God. He has been thrust forth because woe is to him if he preaches not the gospel. Christ is his ideal and Christ his life. In his effort to present his ideal and live the Christian life among a strange people he is always tempted to minimize the differences and clothe the message and the life in forms that will make their appeal to the native.

He gradually loses his contacts with the home constitu-

They were works of mercy and kindness designed to lift, bless and help men. But wrought under the impulse of love, they were always framed within the boundaries of law: law as he knew it. Further, they were not "ends" in themselves. They were benevolent in that they made no distinction between good and bad people. Christ saw need and met it, independent of any other consideration. But the full purpose of them was not achieved until they had become the means of fulfilling his greater work, namely, the harmonizing of the human spirit with God. The miracles succeeded in part only, if they brought physical and mental relief to the needy, even as the distribution of food and medicine to a miscellaneous crowd succeeds if hunger be appeased and pain banished. But the success Christ sought was greater than this. He came to bring men to God, hence he connected his cures with the forgiveness of sins and his benevolences with the plea that men should "seek bread that endureth to eternal life." The miracles then were signals, signs to call attention to realities in the spiritual realm.

ency and throws himself into the complex environment of a foreign civilization; he undertakes to "think black" or "yellow" as the case may be. Both chopsticks and fingers were made before forks, and since the main object of the fork is to get something into the mouth, and the finger or chopstick seems to meet the requirement, the missionary becomes increasingly less interested in the machinery of modern civilization, and more and more interested in ideals and forces that will modernize an old one, and make it worthy of eternal life.

So to be any kind of a missionary is a hard job. To be a good one is infinitely difficult. Only the grace of God can accomplish the transformations of life that make the consecrated volunteer into the heroic and life-giving apostle.

The greatest praise that can come to any missionary is the call of the native church to the board: "Let this man stay on. He has been with us thirty years. We do not know much about Christianity, but we know him and want the spirit he manifests toward us. His presence is indispensable to our church life. We trust him, and the coming generation needs his leadership. He does not seem like a foreigner, but rather, like one of the best of us."

The test of the home churches will come when they have to release their missionaries to the native constituencies, and support them in work under native administration. Half of the difficulty of being a missionary will disappear when he does not have to worry about his relation to the denomination, its controversies, its ecclesiasticisms, its budgets; when he can throw himself into the native work and work like a native for natives. He must be as a converted native among his brethren.

A contributed article in the Kiwanis Magazine contains this vigorous statement: "No fallacy is so ruinous, vicious, and foolish as that labor produces everything." Human labor is meant, presumably. Then, certainly labor did not create the world with its natural resources. But who ever said that it did? The actual principle affirmed by those who are interested in the matter is that socially useful labor gives the only morally valid title to property. This is a principle of tremendous consequence. On what ground can a consistent Kiwanian challenge it? This query comes from a Kiwanian.

Hyphenated Preachers

The hyphen has come to the rescue of many pastors, saving them from an otherwise intolerable situation.

By ASA Z. HALL

“WILL the preacher pay?”

This is the pointed and pertinent question which is thrust forward by many business men today. It does not matter so much about his diplomas or his homiletical ability; but his common honesty is being questioned.

How are the mighty fallen! Formerly the ministry was the one profession noted above others for its absolute fidelity to every trust. Today this trust is fluctuating. From a multitude of towns comes the story of some minister's removal leaving behind not “trailing clouds of glory,” but trailing clouds of debt.

Who is responsible? Sometimes it is the preacher himself. There are Judases today just as in Christ's time. More often, however, it is the church that is to blame. The church member who rides to work in a six cylinder car often haggles over the price of a Ford inner tube given to the preacher. The woman who dresses in silks and sables often considers bargain-counter leftovers good enough for the preacher's wife. The pastor feels, with good reason, that he must rent a respectable dwelling and clothe his family fittingly. In his endeavor to meet the demands of his station and the expectations of his parishioners, he lives on a scale beyond his income. Comparatively few churches are paying a living wage to their pastors. The carpenter, bricklayer, plumber, or plasterer often receives higher wages than the preacher. According to government figures, a man and his wife and three children should receive not less than $2600 a year. How many of the rural or even of the city churches pay this amount?

The Preacher Pays

But the greatest portion of the responsibility for present church conditions must rest not so much with the preacher or church as with general economic conditions. With the high cost of necessities and the insistent demand for comforts, conveniences, and labor-saving devices, the preacher's job is no sinecure. He must sail his frail bark between the Scylla of debt on the one hand, and the Charybdis of sheer shabbiness on the other. What wonder that there are wrecks? However, to the honor of the profession be it said that a large and increasing number of preachers are answering the question, “will the preacher pay?” by saying: “Yes, if he has to engage in secular occupations to foot the bills, we will pay.”

Some of the preacher's self-appointed critics view with alarm his strenuous endeavors to meet his honest debts. They term it “secularizing a sacred calling.” They tell him that if he preaches the right kind of gospel, he will have no financial worries; if he trusts God, his bills will be met. This sounds fine—at least to the critics. But if some of these arm-chair fault-finders had to live as they recommend that the preachers live, they might not continue to be so enamored of their theories.

Some preachers have remunerative hobbies. Some raise fancy poultry in a limited back-yard area. Others keep rabbits, while still others breed dogs, horses, or cattle. One city pastor of my acquaintance bred and sold Angora cats. He did it on the quiet; so I may be “letting the cat out of the bag” by telling this about him. Other ministers are forced into secular trades and professions. They become preachers with hyphens. I am personally acquainted with preacher-teachers, preacher-editors, preacher-printers, preacher-carpenters, preacher-farmers, preacher-musicians, preacher-lecturers, preacher-politicians, preacher-insurance agents. I myself am a preacher-doctor. I serve a small church in a town of 1000, and try to “practice” as well as preach.

There are, of course, distinct disadvantages in leading a hyphenated career. Sufficient time is not available for the duties of both professions; no time to gain poise, perfect diction, or polish periods. The duties of one career often conflict with the duties of the other, giving rise to misunderstandings and disappointments because of attempted fidelity to two distinct lines of work.

Dual and Triple Role Successes

Yet there are noted men who have succeeded in dual or triple roles. Harry Emerson Fosdick is not the less sought after as a lecturer to students or as an author because of his brilliant gifts as a preacher. This is also true of Bernard C. Clausen. We pay homage to W. L. Stidger and Clinton Wunder, both business executives and spiritual leaders of great churches. Russell Conwell, the lecturer, detracted nothing from the renown of Russell Conwell, the preacher and college president. While the modern preacher has traded his Prince Albert coat for a case of type or a teacher's certificate, I am convinced that in the majority of cases both the preacher and the church are gainers by the transaction. New points of contact have been formed with the world. Preacher and church have lost some of their aloofness. They have been humanized. Across church and parsonage doors as across railroad tickets may well appear the legend: “Not good if detached.”

It is easy to see some of the advantages of the hyphenated preacher. If he is a poultry-raiser, he will become better acquainted with all the “chickens” in town. If he raises rabbits, he will understand better how to deal with “hare-brained” parishioners. If he produces Angoras, he will learn the tricks of the “catty,” and will know how to stroke the fur of all his fur-bearing parishioners the right way; while the preacher-printer will become so well acquainted with the “devil” that he can readily outwit him at his own game.

But, speaking seriously, the preacher who has an interest outside the church will learn to mingle with men as a man. The old division of people into three sexes, male, female, and ministerial, will apply no longer. The hyphenated preacher learns to think the thoughts of the pew and to speak the vernacular. He may lack sophistry, but he gains real knowledge; he may lack artistry, but he gains force; he may lack poise, but he gains incisiveness; he may lack detachment, but he gains a truer perspective; he may lack professionalism, but he gains vigor and self-respect. He has Paul as his model. Paul was hyphenated, a preacher-tent-maker, but he was “a man of parts.”

The preacher, though often accepting the hyphen with misgiving, usually will gain more than he loses. The hyphen makes it possible for the preacher to serve a needy church that without his ministries must close its doors; or it may enable him to build a parsonage or a new church edifice which otherwise must be impossible.

I have in mind a preacher who ministered to a church in a neighboring city of 10,000 inhabitants. He is a preacher-farmer, and is not ashamed of his hyphen. He raises wheat on a large dry-land acreage and "makes good" at it. For several years he turned all his salary back into the building fund of the church. The result is a fine, modern, well-equipped plant that stands as a monument to this preacher's devotion, all made possible by the hyphen. Time would fail us to enumerate all the contributions made to needy students, to missions, to church extension and community service by hyphenated preachers. Their record is on high.

Sometimes the preacher's wife has to furnish the hyphen by doing her own work and much else. All honor to the wives of American pastors who are making one dollar do the work of two and one garment do the work of half a dozen; all honor to their devotion, service and self-sacrifice. They catch the vision glorious of the mission of the church and the exalted station of the pastor as Christ's ambassador. With faces uplifted in loftiest hope and courage, they give themselves gladly in self-effacing service in the home, in the schoolroom as teachers, as tutors, clerks, typists, dressmakers.

Hear, then, the conclusion of the matter. Preachers are leading hyphenated lives largely from necessity. This necessity has been occasioned most frequently by the churches. Many churches think they are doing plenty when they are scarcely doing half what they should. The hyphen has come to the rescue of the average pastor. It saves him from a situation otherwise intolerable. It also saves many a weak church from extinction. Instead of resenting it as an intrusion and a curse, let us welcome the hyphen as a new solution to a vexing problem.

Do We Need a New Phrase?

BY F. W. NORWOOD

YOU CANNOT read the Acts of the Apostles without finding your ordinary historical habits of mind constantly jolted and disorganized by expressions such as these: "The Holy Ghost came upon them." "The Holy Ghost fell upon them." "They received the Holy Ghost." "They were filled with the Holy Ghost."

Here is a book that does not fit into ordinary categories. You are fond of history. The number of books that you read upon the subject is amazing, and the more you have read, the deeper has been the conviction in your mind that all history is characterized by similarity. If you can understand the history of any one people, you can understand the history of every other people. If you can trace the rise of any great human movement, you can trace the rise of every great human movement. Every serious student of history either quotes or coins for himself this saying, "History repeats itself."

But does it? Where else can you remember a history that is whitened all over as with falling snowflakes by sayings such as: "The Holy Ghost fell upon them." "The Holy Ghost came upon them." "They were filled with the Holy Ghost." This is unusual.

The modern mind does not altogether like the unusualness of the New Testament. Here is a book that disturbs your categories and discredits your axioms. It is difficult to fit it into your scheme of things. The modern mind has a simple way of dealing with this problem: it erases from the New Testament the things that are unusual. It would describe the rise of the Christian church as if it were tracing that, let us say, of trade unionism, and whenever it comes across a phrase that is unusual it promptly rules it out. Take your editorial blue pencil and go through the record, eliminating the things that are uncommon. You cannot, of course, begin with the Acts of the Apostles; you must go farther back and begin with the Gospels. Here is the story of the virgin birth; pencil it out. Here are the miracles; rule them out. Here are sayings that no other man save Jesus could have used, or ever did use; run your pencil through them. Here is a story of the dead coming to life again; quick, you cannot be too quick, in ruling that out. And now you have a gospel you can believe, only you need not call it a gospel, for there is no suggestion of good tidings about it. What you have is a rather pathetic story of a Galilean youth so beautiful that the world would not tolerate him. But at least you have what you wanted. You have a story that will fit into your categories. You can lift it bodily now, and put it into any "Outline of History," and dispose of it in a few paragraphs.

But are you sure that you have been historical? Are you sure that Jesus was only an amiable dreamer? Are you sure that the first Christian apostles were the most ignorant and extravagantly superstitious people who ever launched a great human movement?

Why should you be so pathetically anxious to get this record down to the normal? Is human history so thrilling and satisfying that you do not wish to disturb the status quo? As a reader of history, is not the one thing that depresses you amid your fascinating study the discovery that human nature changes so little? We seem to be today almost as our fathers were, except for a few extraneous alterations in our condition and in the implements we use. Does not a feeling of pessimism come over your mind sometimes as you contemplate the future in the light of history? What value are all the changes that may come to us unless human nature can be changed? Why is it that we have an extended franchise unless the voters have so increased in caliber as to find for themselves rulers better than those with which the autocratic system would have endowed them? Of all forms of human association democracy is the most foredoomed to disruption and decay unless accompanied by improving morale. What is the value of lessened hours of labor if we have not character enough to use our leisure properly? What is wealth if we remain merely sensual? It gives wings wherewith we may fly to the devil instead of plodding there on foot. Is this distressing unchangeableness of human nature that worries you greatly as an historian. When, therefore, you do come across a story that seems to show that human nature can be and has been changed, why are you so eager to drag it down to the average level? The fact is, you cannot get the New Testament into your ordinary historical categories. It is a unique book, and by the time you have made it an average book it is not the New Testament.

Suppose God did give his Best Beloved for the redemption of the world, which is what all Christians, whether conservative or liberal, want to believe, would you not expect something a little out of the common? Must God also preserve the status quo? If there were a direct manifestation of the redeeming grace of God, would you not expect that it would take the form of an impingement upon human character? In what other way could God help men?

I find that the New Testament bears witness to something that moves along these very lines: First, the revelation of a perfect character; second, the revelation of that character in such terms that men were bound to love and imitate it; and third, the demonstration that such men did validly imitate it.

The New Testament follows the historical method. Its writers claim no originality, but are merely witnesses and recorders. The originality was in Jesus. These men tried to tell what Jesus did and said. They produced the most original and creative book in the world; but they did it by suppressing their own inventiveness. They were not at all satisfied with their achievement; they were conscious of their limitations. But they sat at the feet of Jesus. They never presumed to sit as it were above him and amplify and round out his character and teaching by their own literary devices. There is a curious note of conservatism running through the New Testament. Even Paul, daring innovator as he was, is plainly held fast by something that he dare not alter. What they succeed in doing between them is to leave an impression upon men's minds of a perfect character, actualized in flesh and blood.

It is plain, too, that the effect of his life upon them was to stimulate their love and powers of imitation. They saw in Jesus Christ some things concerning themselves which had seemed before too good to believe strongly. They heard his words echoing in the innermost sanctuary of their being. They saw even in his tragic death a revelation of the infinite love of God, and in his resurrection a vision of a salvation which was to the uttermost, and a manifestation of the life eternal. That is what they saw. That is what created Christianity. If they had seen less than that, Christianity would not have been born, or could not have endured.

Further, they demonstrated that there was a power that could make men who saw such things different from what they had been. Indeed, they accepted it as a sine qua non of belief in Jesus Christ that men should become changed in character. They were not satisfied when a man gave his intellectual assent to the story of the gospel. They were not even placated when he had courage to witness to his belief by being baptized. Nothing would content them but that the man who said he believed in Jesus must manifest a change of character, must overcome his sins, must turn out his hate and be inspired by love, must cease to be a coward and become brave. This change of character was the very thing the church was built upon.

I am not primarily concerned with the expressions they used to describe it. "The Holy Ghost fell upon them." "They were filled with the Holy Ghost." Say if you will that the word "Ghost" is unfortunate. It has a different connotation in our minds than it had in theirs. It has been wisely altered to the term "Spirit." Say if you like that the doctrine of the trinity is the most abstruse doctrine in the world. But they had to use some phrase to describe something that had happened, and I would to God men had to invent a phrase now to describe the same phenomenon. I should not care what they called it so long as ordinary folk had to find some common expression to describe a change in their neighbors created by their faith in Christ. If they said, as they did in the days of the Methodist revival, that such an one had "got religion," I should let it pass so long as it was an attempt to describe observed phenomena. I should not expect in our time a theological phrase. That we are not coining any phrases at all seems the ominous thing.

The true doctrine of Christianity is that God seeks among men the very things that were made manifest in Jesus Christ. The true doctrine of the Holy Spirit is not a metaphysical labyrinth in which subtle minds may entangle themselves, but an assurance that the highest powers of man may be amplified by invisible grace. Christianity reaches its culmination in a man when his neighbors have to invent a phrase to describe a real and palpable change in him. The need of our time is that the necessity should be thrust upon non-believers of coining a new phrase to describe this ancient and indispensable phenomenon.—The Christian World.

His Silent Years

I KNOW not where Christ spent the silent years, Though some have claimed that in the Tibet mounts

He sought the Buddhist arts,
That in Benares he had learned from seers,
Had talked with God by Ganges' mystic founts
And there won Hindu hearts.

I do not know where Leh and Hemis are,
Where Christ perchance poured forth his soul in prayer,

I only know that he Walked Judea's paths, and that from near and far
The people came, his golden words to hear Beside old Galilee.

I do not know what pain the Master bore
When treading heat-parched plains or coral strands,

I know not what he saw,
I only know he wearied and grew sore
From walking Jordan's dead and burning sands
Expounding sacred law.

I do not know with whom the Saviour went Nor why he searched for secret calm retreat
If mayhap thus he hid,
I only know his later time was spent
With fisher-folk he gathered from the street
Who proved the work he did.

I do not know what sacrifice he made
When leaving home and humble childhood's place,
But eyes of faith can see,

I only know that on the cross he paid
The price of love; himself he could abase
For us on Calvary.

Let scholars prate and delve in hidden things,
Enough for me to know he lived and died
And from the grave arose,
To know that now, he, with the King of Kings
Through all eternity is glorified,
And love he still bestows.

The Devotional Life

Standing the Test

BY OWEN PHILIPS EACHES

JESUS tested his disciples to ascertain their growth in the Christian life. He said to them, "What do you think of me? Who am I? You have been with me for over two years; what is your estimate of me?" If they had joined in the general view of him it would have shown a lack of clearness in his teaching, a lack of impressiveness in his person, or a spiritual stupidity in the disciples. They stood the test in a fine way. The answer of Peter, expressing largely the minds of all, won the approbation of the Teacher. They received a mark approaching 100 though afterward in individual cases, when tested in conduct and teaching, they could not receive more than a bare fifty.

Loving Straight; Thinking Crooked

Philip had a personal and private testing. A crowd of 5000 was present on a slope northeast of the Lake of Galilee. How would it be cared for? The disciples with a narrow horizon of thinking could see no remedy but sending them away to look out for themselves. Jesus said in a quiet, conversational way, "Whence are we to buy bread that these may eat?" John adds, "This he said to prove him; for he himself knew what he would do". Had Jesus reason for thinking that Philip had learned the meaning of his person and power? Was Jesus expecting a larger knowledge on Philip's part of the capacity of Jesus to meet emergencies, to overcome Red sea difficulties and to see the solution that he already had in mind? The question of Jesus implied that he thought he had a right to expect a cleverer answer from Philip than he received. The longer an acquaintance there is with Jesus the larger ought to be the intellectual knowledge of him. Philip did not fail in his spiritual knowledge of Christ, but he fell short in his intellectual conception of his teacher. He loved straight, but he thought crooked.

Dr. Henry van Dyke says that the first thing needful to keep one's mind clear is "to think without confusion clearly". The misconceptions in Christian thinking, the heterodoxies at times result from

Worship

It would be unprofitable for you to spend all the hours of the seven days of the week sitting rooted and enraptured in your pew. Heaven as a city is an inevitable figure of the imagination, since it is only in cities that the large community of human experience can be found. Joyful and reverent worship is the natural expression of the common reverence toward the Father of us all. You could not make an imaginative picture of the joys of heaven in words without some introduction of these elements, so familiar and so necessary to our human fellowship, of self-expression. But I can remember as a child how little attractive was the picture of the life to come which found expression in those lines of the old hymn that tell of a heaven:

Where congregations ne'er break up
And Sabbaths have no end.

That there will always be an opportunity as well as a desire of common worship and of common praise in any city of the heavenly realm I do believe, and in this the hymn is right. But that all the people will be all the time at worship is quite another matter and it would have helped if this had been explained to my disturbed and perplexed childish imagination. There are churches that are always open for the needs and uses of their congregations in our human cities and I am always glad that they are there. I like to feel that at any moment, or in any mood of need, I can find a place of refreshment and communion in the Father's house. But I have other errands elsewhere in a world he never has withdrawn from and where I can always and everywhere count upon his presence. — Saturday Night Thoughts, Boston Transcript.

the head knowledge not having an equal growth with the heart knowledge. Numbers of people love and adore Christ as Saviour, but their intellectual conceptions of him are imperfect and one-sided. They are modern Philips.

Three of the disciples did not stand the test of opportunity and obligation. Jesus called them to a special service, the privilege and duty of helping him on his way to the cross. He wanted the sympathy, the human helpfulness, the courage of these men. They did not comprehend the significance of that night, did not know what service they could render. They fell asleep at the post of duty assigned them. They saw afterward what a great opportunity they had missed. Had they understood at the time, they would at all hazards have kept awake. Jesus did not denounce them, call them enemies of the kingdom, traitors to the faith. He made excuses for them. It was not their faith, their moral nature, that gave way; it was their nervous nature that caused them not to stand the test. He said gently and considerably, "It was not your intention to fail me. Your hearts were right, but your bodies failed you." When the nerves went down, the whole manhood went down at the same time.

Peter Finds Himself

Peter did not stand the test on the eve of his Lord's death. But when he found time to call up his reserve forces he was himself again. Cramer recanted his Protestant faith, his real belief. At the stake Tennyson makes him say:

"And since my hand offended, having written Against my heart, my hand shall first be burnt
So it may come to the fire."

His head and heart and hand united in standing the test at the end. Every day we are all unconsciously passing tests showing who and what and where we are.

Meeting Helps" on C. L. P. Topic for October 24

CHRISTIANIZING THE CITY

Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in "Young People's Leader" the official magazine "For all Baptist young people." Subscriptions to the "Leader" may be made through the B.Y.P.U. of America, $1 per year.

As is suggested in Young People's Leader, this topic naturally divides into two parts: the need, and meeting the need. In addition to the material given in the Leader on the need, perhaps you can use some of your personal knowledge of the need in the cities of the land.

Remember in presenting this topic and others, that definite examples or illustrations will carry more to the listener than will abstract statements. Or, better yet, if you can supplement your series and statements with pictures, snapshots, or postcards showing something of the condition of large cities, the young people will be able to "see" for themselves just what these conditions are.

The material on meeting the need, supplemented by the leaflets suggested in the Leader will give you ample with which to work.

However, as has been said before, one of the things to do is to put this lesson to some practical use in coming days. You may be wondering how your young people can help to meet the need of the city, even though you may live a long distance from any large center. This is the way:

1. Contribute to these Christian centers through the regular missionary channels of the church. The young people should be urged to give something each week to missions, for even a small amount will be missed if it is not given.
2. Send materials or helps to these Christian centers. If you send to the literature department, 276 Fifth ave., New York City, or Ford bldg., Boston, 504 Columbia bldg., Los Angeles, Calif., or 2328 S. Michigan ave., Chicago, for a copy of "Christian Community Houses Centers" (two cents) you will have a copy of all these Christian centers in the country. By writing to the one nearest you, you can find out how your young people can help, for there is always something which can be done. Probably you can write to the Christian center before the meeting and have a letter from the person in charge telling more definitely about the work or one particular phase of the work. Then your young people can get to work to help.

A Baptist Powwow

Things are doing in young people's work all over the land. A great Sunday-school and B. Y. P. U. convention of more than 1000 Indians representing eight tribes was held in Oklahoma for four days during July.

Bungalow sleeping quarters and eight large dining camps were provided for the convention. There was an abundance of everything to eat, and the pastor, Rev. P. R. Ewing, and his people, together with some of the neighboring churches, deserve praise for their care of that vast throng of people.

The church stands at one side of a two-acre lot, and in front of the church was erected a large tabernacle where a Bible school was held in the Indian language for the older Indians. At the other side of the lot a brush arbor was put up for the young people and here, day and night, two meetings were held in English.

The fellowship of these meetings was delightful. Every speaker, both English and Indian, seemed to be at his best. One Indian, in speaking of the state B. Y. P. U. secretary, Mr. T. H. Farmer, said, "If he could farm the way he can talk, there wouldn't be a cocklebur left in Oklahoma."

The singing was wonderful and everyone joined in with enthusiasm. It seemed at times that the angels in heaven were joining in these praises—so wonderful were they.

Three of the five new B. Y. P. U.'s organized the past year gave enjoyable presentations of missionary plays.

One of the missionaries says, "When these Indians are convinced that a movement is of the Lord, they are for it, and when they get behind any denominational movement, they make it go."

Isn't this convention a "spectacle to conjure with?" Isn't it a challenge to us to do as well? Here are the people to whom we have sent missionaries, getting behind our denominational program and making a go of it. Here are the people whom we oftentimes think are dependent upon us, going ahead doing the things we ought also to be doing. Here are these new members of the Baptist family working harder at the household tasks than some of us who have been in the family a long time. Surely we can glean a lesson from these people and determine to work harder than ever before.

A Novel "Ad"

It is not often that the young people of a community take a place in a community parade. This is such a good way of advertising, however, that we are passing this on to you.

In the Independence day parade of the community, the Harlan (Iowa) B.Y.P.U. took the third prize of $10. The float was "The Little Brown Church in the Wildwood."

A wooden framework was covered with corrugated board painted brown. Roofing paper formed the roof. Four windows and a door, edged in black, were cut in the sides. Black strips along the sides made the board look more like wood. Above the door was a sign bearing the name of the church.

The top was a replica of the church tower, with a bell in the "steeple." Imitation grass and evergreen trees were placed in front of the church to give it the realistic touch needed.

This church was placed on a large truck (donated for the purpose) and in addition to the red, white, and blue trimmings on the truck, two placards bearing the B. Y. P. U. emblem were placed in prominent positions.

Inside the "church" was an organ and a group of chairs. During the parade the minister's wife played and the group of young people sang "The Church in the Wildwood." Between verses the bell in the steeple was tolled.

All communities have parades some time during the year. As a rule every other organization is represented, but the church is omitted. Isn't it a good idea to have a float for the church?

Not only will such a float show the community that the church has its place, and is striving to help the community and take an active part in it, but it will advertise the church and make people want to attend. Besides, it really is a lot of fun to prepare and take a part in such a float. Why not try it?

The Chimney Corner

"How Doth the Busy Little Bee——"

BESIDES "improving the shining hours" the busy little bee doth also talk. Ruby Denton tells about it in Our Dumb Animals. After much scientific investigation, Dr. Karl von Frisch, a noted German entomologist, has discovered how bees talk. They communicate with one another by their feet. In talking, they do not touch one another, but deliver their message by a nimble movement of their feet, which we should call a kind of dance.

The method the scientist used in his research is almost as interesting as the discovery itself. The doctor first built several hives entirely of glass, so that he could see exactly what was going on in them. He made small doors to these hives in order to let the bees in and out as he wished. He placed the hives on one side of his garden, on the opposite side of which was a small patch of clover in bloom. Then, between the hives and the clover patch, he built a screen maze, or labyrinth, a place full of intricate passageways which covered the entire garden.

This done, he lifted up a small door of one of the hives, letting one bee out. With some bright red coloring material he painted a red cross on the back of this bee, so that he would be able to distinguish it from the rest. He then released the marked bee to travel through the network of passages in search of food. It went on its journey, baffled at times by enclosures and blind alleys, but it kept on, retracing its steps time after time, until it finally succeeded in reaching the clover patch at the corner of the garden.

After it had gathered a load of nectar, it flew quickly back through the elab-

The House at the End of the Lane

I LOOK through the shadows of mist and of rain,
The changes of gladness and tears,
To a dear little house at the end of the lane

That was mine in the vanishing years.
I see the old doorway with vines overgrown,
And the dooryard with blossoms so fair,
And the light in the window that cheerfully shone
When my mother kept watch for me there.

I look through the distances stretching ahead,
(They too shall mix pleasure and pain)

And see past the years that so soon will be sped

A house at the end of the lane.
It stands on the shore of the glimmering sea

Where the heavenly multitudes wait.
A light in the window is shining for me,
And my Father is there at the gate.

orate channels to the glass hive, where Doctor Frisch opened the little door and let the wanderer in. The scientist kept his eye on the marked bee in the glass hive by means of a large magnifying glass resembling a reading glass. It was then that the entomologist received the surprise of his life. The bee with the red cross moved its feet and wings up and down in a peculiar rhythmic fashion, and no sooner had it made this movement than all the other bees around it went through exactly the same antics.

Shortly afterward Doctor Frisch opened the hive. The bee with the brilliant red cross on its back came out, followed by a host of other workers. The marked bee, continuing to lead the way, took the other bees to the clover patch without any difficulty. And from that time on, all the bees could traverse the intricate maze without going into a blind alley or losing any time. Through further observation, Doctor Frisch learned that bees have different movements and act in different ways, according to the story they wish to tell. When angry, for instance, they move in a peculiar zigzag fashion.

Still further study and observation revealed that the bee does not work all the time, as was previously believed, but takes time for rest and play. So the bee, although it does not realize that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," instinctively carries out that idea. Nevertheless, when it works, it works with all its might. Only in war times do humans come near approaching the strenuous activities of the bee.

The bee often works both day and night, gathering the pollen and nectar during the daytime and helping to fan the nectar with its wings during the night, to make the sweet fluid thicker by evaporation. One authority says that it takes 20,000 bees to make a single pound of honey. It also takes five pounds of the sweet and precious nectar from the flowers to make one pound of honey. So, although the bee does not always work in accordance with the latest scientific investigations, the phrase "busy as a bee" still retains its full significance.

BOYS and Girls

Anchoring a Sunbeam with a Yellow Cord

BY MARGARET T. APPEGARTH

"STUFF and nonsense!" said her mother sternly—but sadly, too. "There'll be plenty of other little girls to come along and sit in your place. You know all you need to know. Anyhow, your father has arranged the marriage, so you have nothing to say about it. You had much better get it over with quietly, for when you get to your new home your mother-in-law will have lots of things to teach you herself—not quite like school, maybe, but you'll have to learn her way of cooking and caring for the house."

"Oh! Oh! Oh!" wailed Sunbeam, "I don't want any horrid old mother-in-law! I want a school, I—"

"Silence!" roared her father, stamping to the room. And silence there was!

Chapter II

Sunbeam's father was simply doing his duty. He loved her, perhaps; but he loved custom more. He was afraid of custom! It had to be obeyed. So Sunbeam was married, as he had planned. A yellow cord was hung around her neck, a little gold piece dangled from the cord for a yellow cord plus such a gold piece from the wedding ring of India. And it anchored Sunbeam. It anchored her in her husband's house which is called the zenana, meaning the rooms where the women must stay. No more running outdoors to play! No more starting off in the morning for school! No more visiting the next door! No more freedom or fun! For that yellow cord anchored Sunbeam forever. You can hardly blame her for not feeling Sunbeam-ish any longer. She really wept buckets of tears; she sighed and cried. She was utterly miserable until one day when the white teacher discovered her new home, and came to call.

There never was a visit like that one. It put new life into Sunbeam, for the missionary said: "Dear child, this marriage breaks my heart almost as much as it breaks your heart. But I know God expects both of us to make the best of it. So the thing for me to do is to come to see you as often as possible, and the thing for you to do is to recommend your new religion to this whole household of new relatives. Had you thought of that?"

No, it had never dawned on Sunbeam, not once! She hung her brown head and confessed that she had wickedly been thinking only of herself.

"I know," smiled the missionary, lovingly, "but suppose that from now on you think hard about others. Don't you remember that in school one day I told the Bible story about a great captain named Naaman? He was a great man, indeed, an important man, a man used to commanding, and to being obeyed. But he was a leper. I don't need to tell you what a dreadful disease leprosy is, for India has lepers on almost every street. Well, the whole point of the story for you is that in Naaman's household was a little Syrian maid servant, just your age, the most unimportant little slave girl, anchored in the service of that family, to fetch and to carry and to mind everybody else and never speak up! Yet one day she screwed up her courage and went into the presence of the great lord Naaman: 'Oh master,' she said, 'down in Israel there is a man of God with power to heal the sick. I really think he could cure you of your leprosy; he is the prophet Elisha, master.' And because that one little anchored slave girl spoke up so bravely, Naaman decided to go to see this man of God down in Israel, and he was cured. Don't you see how nearly this is like your own case, my dear? Suppose you sing our little Christian songs all day long. Suppose you pray that God will help you to be happy and cheerful and kind instead of glum and silent and disagreeable. It seems to me that it might make a real change in this household."

Now that was a big order. For there were dozens of persons in that house, and they had all lived there for years and years, whereas Sunbeam was a new comer. But she had had a new idea given her! It was something definite to do. If you had been there in India you could have heard her pray each evening: "Oh Lord Jesus, thy little slave did not do much good today, but do help her tomorrow. She is such a stupid little slave, Lord Jesus, she needs thy help every single minute."

Well, Sunbeam is still anchored in that gloomy old zenana. It would be pleasant to say that everybody was made over just because of her; but that would be stretching the truth, I fear! But this we can say, honestly and truthfully: the entire family is beginning to be interested in her little Bible. "Can you find us that story the missionary told the other day when she was here?" they often ask.

So Sunbeam turns the pages and turns the pages, but it is like looking for a needle in a haystack. "Alas!" she cries, "I am such a stupid girl, I don't even know enough to find the story here in God's book. But I think maybe I could tell it by heart, doesn't it start this way?"

So she tells it, and if anybody thinks she has made a mistake, he corrects her, so that sometimes you really would not recognize the best-known Bible stories; but this you would recognize—that Sunbeam is doing her best, and if more of the other little wives anchored with yellow cords could do as much as she, then India would be a different place, I think.

ONE HUNDRED

MORE MISSIONARIES!

How can we have them? By sending our church allotments every month as they become due.

And it will not cost us a cent.*

Do not compel the missionary societies to pay interest on what your church intends to give and will give before the end of the year. Nearly $100,000 was wasted in this way last year. Let's support missionaries instead of banks! Let's have a grand round-up by October! —Reprinted from The Maine Baptist Messenger.

A FAIR OFFER.

The board of directors of the Massachusetts Baptist Convention has voted to provide churches which are not using the envelope system for both current expenses and benevolences, with double envelopes for a year, free of charge. This offer is made in the interest of helping the churches raise their own budgets more easily and effectively, and also with the purpose of stimulating missionary giving. Moreover, the additional offer is made that, if any church does not receive more money by this method than without the envelopes, the convention will be willing to provide envelopes for another year. This offer is not made to churches which are using the envelope system at present, but only to those churches which are not using envelopes for current expenses and benevolences.

YOUNG PEOPLE AS SPEAKERS.

Denison university has a gospel team composed of young men from the college who are willing to give up their weekends in order to visit churches and hold meetings attractive to all. The only cost to the church is the expense of the team, the members of which prefer to stay in the homes of the community, especially homes in which there are young people. The team is desirous of aiding in B. Y. P. U. associational meetings and rallies.

The great task of the church today is to attract and hold its young people, and what better way is there than to bring them into contact with young people who are preparing to become Christian leaders?

OHIO'S LEGION OF HONOR.

The following Ohio churches have definitely signified their intention to send in approximately one-twelfth of their missionary quota each month. Many other churches in the state are showing by their contributions from month to month their intention to pay one-twelfth monthly, but the following have so signified in definite written statement:

Akron Association, Arlington Street, Calvary; Ashtabula Association, Geneva; Auglaize Association, St. Mary's; Cleveland Association, East Cleveland, Cleveland Heights; Clinton Association, Chillicothe, Vigo; Columbus Association, Hillcrest, Granville, Newark First; Dayton Association, Lisbon, Springfield First, St. Paris, Tippecanoe City; Marietta Association, Valley; Miami Association, Evanston, Immanuel, Price Hill, Hamilton, Lockland, Norwood, Wyoming; Mt. Vernon Association, Mt. Gilead; Pomery Association, Antiquity; Portsmouth Association, Portsmouth, Calvary; Toledo Association, Findlay, Haskins, Riverside; Trumbull Association, Girard, Youngstown Calvary; Wooster Association, New Philadelphia, Wooster; and Zoar Association, Mt. Moriah, and Steubenville.

WISCONSIN ADOPTS

FIVE-YEAR OBJECTIVE

In the anniversary number of the Wisconsin Baptist, issued in August, 1926, the executive department of the state convention recommends the following five-year financial missionary objective for the state:

"We recommend that the missionary goal for our state convention be set at a minimum of $72,000 for the present year, that this be increased from year to year until it reaches the average of the new world movement period, or not less than $105,000 per year. We believe that this lies in the realm of possibility during the next five years.

"With this thought in mind we recommend that every church in the state increase its denominational offerings this year by a minimum of 15 per cent over the offerings of the year which closed Apr. 30, 1926, and where this does not bring the offering of a given church up to what it was during the year which closed Apr. 30, 1925, we suggest that such church strive to at least attain to the figures of the year 1924-25. We also suggest that our churches increase by 15 per cent every year for the coming five years. This, in the majority of cases, we think is not too much to ask. We do not mean that the vote of the convention makes this the rule for the individual church, but suggest that every church study its financial ability with this thought in mind, and that wherever possible the church fix this as a minimum goal."

ADOPTS THE PLAN.

The Spokane Liberty Park church has voted to adopt the every-member plan and is putting it into operation at once. In preparation for the coming evangelistic campaign, prayer groups are being formed and cottage meetings are planned for the first two weeks of January.

WHAT CONSTITUTES

A MISSIONARY CHURCH?

In general, a missionary church is one which has a vision of the world's need of a Saviour, feels the urgent call of the great commission, purposes to answer the call, and wishes to cooperate with others who are responding to the same call in order that the great mass of humanity may have the Saviour and the blessings of his kingdom.

In particular, a missionary church is one which has a pastor who is imbued with the missionary spirit and who has the desire to see the whole world brought under the sway of the gospel. The deacons of this church cooperate with its pastor in his missionary purposes and efforts. The trustees are willing to propose a generous missionary budget for the church to be adopted with the budget for current expenses. There is a church missionary committee composed of a representative of each organization of the church, that representative being the leader of missionary education in his or her department of the church. On this committee should be one or two members from the church at large who understand the situation in the church as a whole. The committee is alive to all missionary developments and alert to grasp every opportunity to put them before the church in church missionary meetings, through the church bulletin, at missionary socials, by disseminating literature, and by all other means available.

The women's circle cooperates with all the efforts of the missionary committee and by its activities creates an atmosphere favorable to the enterprises of the missionary committee.

A missionary church has a definite missionary program and works to its accomplishment, having among other objectives the payment of one-twelfth of the missionary budget each month, the increasing of subscriptions to missionary publications, particularly Missions, the gaining of more stewardship adherents, and the winning of volunteers who will give their lives in Christian service.—Reprinted from The Ohio Baptist.

Among Ourselves

A British Causerie

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

Doctor Moffatt's Bible.

ABOUT two years ago quite a sensation was caused by the publication of a new translation of the Bible by Doctor Moffatt. That one man should undertake such a colossal task was in itself amazing. The revised version of the Bible which appeared in 1881 was the work of a group of scholars and it took them years to complete it. It was inevitable that Doctor Moffatt's attempt would challenge comparison with the greater work. Those who have read the preface to Moffatt's Bible will understand the purpose he had in view. He has not tried to rival the greater work, but to supplement it with a translation which has the advantage of presenting idiomatic English many passages which mean little to ordinary readers of the older versions. When the book first appeared it was received in certain quarters with contemptuous criticism, and even abuse. It was deemed irreverent. But it has won its way so completely that the three original volumes are now issued in one volume, and in this form it will undoubtedly have an enormous circulation. I have used the book daily during the last year in private reading, and more than once have read Old Testament passages from it in public. In the latter case the effect has been immense. The congregation has been alert and keen not to miss a word. In particular the historical books become alive in a new way. We are reading not ancient but contemporaneous history. I commend this book to brother ministers for occasional use in this way. They will be surprised to see the new interest awakened in the Bible. At a time when, in general admission, Bible reading is falling into decay, it would be well to awaken it by the use of a translation which compels attention. Of course some will always be prejudiced against any version but that which they have been familiar from infancy. But prejudice does not fall within the province of reasonable actions.

The New Prayer Book.

The bishops and others are busy preparing the final draft of the revised Book of common prayer. The publication is expected some time next year. It has already leaked out that a number of changes have been permitted which may cause serious trouble in the church of England. The evangelicals are alarmed and have issued an appeal to their supporters to withstand any change which threatens the Protestant character of the prayer book. The changes in the communion service, for example, are said to be in the direction of greater freedom for the sacerdotal party, which is at present undoubtedly the dominant party in the church of England. Fear is expressed that the concessions in the matter of reservation will lead to other things which are Roman and which the extreme party is determined to obtain. In any case the new prayer book will be like the old one in one particular, it will be a compromise, and a compromise in these things satisfies nobody, as the history of the last 400 years shows. After all the main thing is what is the church of England, Catholic or Protestant? Until that matter is settled friction will continue. Of course both terms need defining. And there is the matter of the settlement. The entire question is much involved both politically and religiously. The remarkable thing is that the Anglo Catholics now claim to be the true evangelical party in the church. They say that the mass and all it stands for is the sole guarantee of evangelical truth.

The Little White Church on the Hill

("The Little White Church on the Hill" is a lecture on rural communities written by Rev. A. H. Sulphin of Redbank, N. J. Following the giving of this lecture at Paris, Me., Anesta Eastman wrote this poem.)

YOU have sung of the "church in the wildwood,"

The loveliest place in the dell,
The spot dear to somebody's childhood,
"The little brown church in the vale,"
But I wish I might hear you all singing,
And I'm hoping that sometime I will,
Not about the brown church in the valley,

But about the white church on the hill.
As the lighthouse, on guard at the seashore,
Shows the port to the mariner's eye,
So the little white church on the hilltop
Points the way to the mansions on high.

Like the light of a welcoming fire,
Look from any direction you will,
You may catch a bright gleam from the spire

Of the little white church on the hill.
It is not one of earth's grand cathedrals,
It is not a vast temple of stone,
But the little white church on the hilltop
Has an honor that's wholly her own;
From her have gone forth mighty leaders
Whose praises the angels might sing,
For they went to proclaim the "Glad Tidings,"

The wondrous "Good News" of the King.

And that's why I wish you were singing,
And I'm hoping that sometime you will,
Not about the "brown church in the valley"

But about the white church on the hill.

Here again it is a question of definition. What is meant by "evangelical"? It would seem that we have come to a time when we must examine once again the terms we use, and clearly say what we mean by them. So long as men are employing the same words with different meanings confusion must reign. How far the new prayer book will help matters forward it is difficult to say at present. If a compromise is reached we shall not be much farther on. Undoubtedly the crux of the matter will be the communion service. Meanwhile it is significant that sacerdotal ideas are growing where we should least expect them. One wonders what it means. Are we in for another reformation or for another counter reformation? Will Luther or Loyola prevail?

A Questionnaire on Religion.

A mild sensation has been caused by the issue of a questionnaire by two leading journals concerning the religious beliefs of the people of this country. There are fourteen questions: Do you believe in a personal God; in an impersonal, purposive and creative power; that the basis of reality is matter; in personal immortality; that Jesus Christ was divine in a sense in which all living men could not be said to be divine; in any form of Christianity; in the apostles' creed; in the formulated tenets of any church; are you an active member of any church; do you voluntarily attend any religious service regularly; do you accept the first chapter of Genesis as historical; the Bible as inspired in any special sense; in transubstantiation; and that nature is indifferent to our ideals?

The questions have been variously received. A number of protests have been offered to the form in which they appear. It is pointed out that a direct "yes" or "no" is impossible for many people and therefore the purpose of the questionnaire is nullified. Prof. Julian Huxley, who is an agnostic, has entered a protest against the questions as they stand. He says he is unable to accept the intellectual foundation of Christianity but he claims to be a truly religious man and to be able to find in prayer a real spiritual force. It should be pointed out that the questions arose out of a statement by an agnostic Jew that "intellectuals" found the universe cold and morally meaningless; he claimed that this would be found to be the position of the majority if put to the test of a questionnaire. Hence the questions placed before the public.

The published replies are remarkable from many points of view. The Nation is reputed to have a weekly circulation of 10,000 copies, yet only 1338 replies have been received. The Daily News has an approximate circulation of a million copies per day, yet only 14,043 replies are published. The proportion of replies to readers, therefore, is amazingly small. It is explained that a number of folk wrote declining to enter the contest for various reasons. Can we then assume that the remainder who have replied really represent the general feeling of the nation? That would be too much to believe. We should want to know who these people are; that might count for much. The figures are significant. The "intellectual" paper is all on the agnostic side. Seven hundred and thirty-six of its readers (out of 1338) say they do not believe in a personal God. Six hundred and sixty-eight declare they see no purpose in nature; 793 that nature is indifferent to our ideals; 646 that there is no personal immortality; 819 that our Lord is not more divine than other men; 918 that the Bible is not especially inspired; while 920 have no belief in any church doctrines. Now for one explanation; more than half of these correspondents declare that they attend no church. Thus they do not put themselves in the way of knowing what Christianity really is. It is a mournful confession. Well! although 736 anonymous persons do not believe in God that makes no difference to the fact of the universe; it is bound to make a vast difference to them. The late Professor Clifford when he gave up belief in God declared that for him the universe had changed; it felt colder; "the Great Companion" was dead.

Emphasis on Faith

The returns of the Daily News are different. Here the emphasis is all on the side of faith, with many variations. The majority confesses to belief in a personal God, in immortality, in the divinity of our Lord, in the inspiration of the Bible. Over 70 per cent declare themselves to be church attendants or members. Again we should like to know who are these people; the personal element counts for so much. Three thousand, eight hundred and eighty-two people say they attend no place of worship, and about this number of votes is cast every time against the faith, which means again that those who do not put themselves in the way of knowing the truth are exactly the people to be befogged or to stumble.

The figures are worthy of a further and fuller analysis, but I have not space in which to deal with them. Two things have emerged however. One is that the boastful agnostic who was so certain that the whole country would rise and deny the gospel has been grievously let down. I have every respect and sympathy for the man who cannot believe and who honestly is groping his way toward the truth. But I have nothing but contempt for the vain coxcomb who imagines that he and his little coterie represent the brains of the country. A second thing that has emerged is the necessity—the dire necessity—for the church to embark upon a great teaching mission. It is evident that many are perplexed about their faith. We are now reaping the bitter harvest of the "stunts" so many have promoted in time past.

"Anything to get the crowd." It is time to teach as well as to evangelize, as did the apostles. While I still regard the questionnaire as a gooseberry of the silly season, the result of it, unsatisfactory as it may be, may be eventually good.

Philadelphia Letter

By ARTHUR C. BALDWIN

THE news from the churches here tells of normal fall activity. Pastors are all back in their places. The two associations, North Philadelphia and Philadelphia, plan to meet a special committee on evangelism among the churches. A definite program has been prepared and busy days are ahead.

Dr. A. Ray Petty, after a summer on his farm in New Hampshire, is preaching to throngs at the temple. He is stressing evangelism in his Sunday evening services and conversions are the regular order.

Rev. Ivan Murray Rose began his second year with the First church, Sept. 19. He starts his new year with the confidence of his people, a well-organized church behind him, and an increasing hold on a popular audience.

Brother G. Morton Walker spent the summer in Scotland and is now back with the First church of Manyunk. This church reports fifty-eight additions during the year, thirty-six of them by baptism. It is reported that the prize bull given by Mr. B. Miles of this church, has arrived safely in Shanghai and that free transportation was granted to it by the provincial governor to the Baptist mission to which it was sent. We have not heard lately of a similar courtesy offered to a missionary but the government recognizes that the bull is a valuable contribution to the welfare of the country.

The harvest home fall meeting of the Northeast Baptist Social Union was held in the Old Pennypack church Sept. 14. Among the speakers were Horace Hunt, Robert Zebley and Arthur C. Baldwin.

Dr. John A. Hainer of the Blockley church followed a large tent meeting evangelistic campaign held near his church by evangelistic services in the church itself toward the end of the summer. He was assisted by Rev. Gordon H. Baker of New York and good results are reported.

In the tent meetings, conducted by the Bosworth party, I understand that divine healing was emphasized and the reports of careful witnesses among our pastors tell of remarkable cases of healing. For example, a woman whose cancerous trouble had continued for eight years, refusing to yield to long and expensive hospital treatment, was cured after prayer and anointing with oil. A woman whose eye was turned in so that she could not see from it, went forward for prayer and anointing. At home the same evening she felt a shock and saw a flash which she did not understand, but in the morning the eye was normal. I am reporting what was told to us by serious witnesses at our ministers' conference. I do not pretend to explain or defend. It simply seems to have happened.

The Nicetown church has filled the vacancy made by Rev. A. E. Harris by calling Rev. Addison E. Pero of Westville, N. J.

Tioga church is still pastorless as are Second church, Germantown and Memorial church. I believe their committee have men in mind but they have made no definite statements as yet.

The Chestnut Street church had commission service Sept. 12, setting apart one of its members, Miss Grace Maine, for missionary service in Burma. She sailed Sept. 18 for service as teacher in the Pwo Karen school at Toungoo. This church has lost another of its young women for missionary service: Aug. 13 at Exeter, N. H., the pastor officiated at the marriage of Miss Rosalie Summerfield, whose father is a deacon in Chestnut Street church, to Mr. Herbert Lamson of Exeter. The young couple left the same afternoon for China where Mr. Lamson is to serve on the faculty of Shanghai Baptist college.

There is the sound of drums and alarms. Pastors' conferences, particularly the Methodist and Presbyterian are busy denouncing many things. Numerous resolutions are being adopted and published in the newspapers. They have denounced the sesquicentennial because it is open on Sunday. They have denounced the Dempsey-Tunney prize fight, the mayor and all his works, and various ministers who have dared preach on the exposition grounds after they, the conferences, had denounced the whole proceedings. These denunciations are heated, and they have grown out of the will of authorities to disregard the Sunday law of 1794 and keep the sesquicentennial exposition open on Sunday.

Keeping the Sabbath Holy

I think they are right in their concern. None of us can look upon the growing disregard of the sacred and creative influences of Sunday without deep concern; yet I deprecate noisy and ill-tempered utterances and red-hot denunciations that only clamor for newspaper space. Some of our conferences are in danger of getting the reputation of common scolds. The appeal to conscience is the easier way but little can be accomplished in this manner. The Sunday law of 1794 which they are so vociferously appealing has been violated one hundred times in letter and spirit by church people. Cabs, trolley cars, ice cream service, Sunday newspapers and travel, automobiles, and many other things violate the traditions the fathers had in mind. We churches have looked with more or less complacency on all this and probably shared it. We are hardly in a position to go back to the law for authority to stop others in the use and abuse of the day. None the less I believe that Sunday desecration has in it a serious peril. We must develop a sane, wholesome, helpful day, and the place to begin is with church people themselves, who must profitably lock up their automobiles on day Sunday, read some good books, quicken worth-while friendships, in addition to attending church.

Baptist Leaders Plan Advance

VICTORY rides on the Baptist horizon. It rose to view in Chicago. The occasion seemed at the outset prosy enough. It was the meeting of the Board of Missionary Cooperation at Chicago Beach hotel, Sept. 25-30. In addition to the large number of board members in attendance, general secretaries or other representatives of all of the cooperating and affiliated organizations were present and lent active cooperation. To prepare the budget for the year 1927-28 and to devise ways and means for raising it were the two great tasks to which the conference was set.

Preliminary meetings of the several groups involved in the budget were held during the first two days, and were devoted by each group to a survey of its field of work to determine its financial needs. Before every group stood the specter of the last few lean years. Some of the organizations had retrenched, reduced expenses and recalled workers until the situation seemed desperate. One or two faced the possibility of financial disaster. Secretaries and state directors had the air of men and women weary with overwork, worn with anxiety and depressed in spirit. There was much earnest praying in those two days. A host of claims pled for inclusion in the budget. A dark hour in the history of the Northern Baptist Convention prevailed when the conference assembled on Monday, received the requests from all claimants and referred the budget as a whole to a committee of adjustment, with Joseph C. Robbins as chairman.

Tuesday morning brought a ray of light. J. C. Robbins and James H. Franklin recounted the splendid achievements in evangelism, education and native initiative in foreign fields, and called for a bold advance. A new and revolutionary conception was announced when one of them said that the era of foreign missions is past, and we have entered the era of international fellowship. The conference began to catch the spirit of daring. At this point the committee on adjustment of the budget brought in the following recommendations:

"1. That we express our conviction that the time has come when we should challenge ourselves and our Baptist churches to a great forward movement, believing that we cannot under present conditions fail to respond to the demands of this hour.

"2. That we believe we should plan for a program covering a three-year period; that for the year 1927-28 we should concentrate on an effort to secure adequate housing for the churches under our city, state and home mission agencies; that for the period 1928-29 we should concentrate on a similar effort to provide for Judson college and other advances abroad; and that for the year 1929-30 a like effort should be made for our Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board and schools and colleges.

"3. That we recommend that the operating budget from donation sources for the year 1927-28 be the same as for the current year with the addition of $75,000 for the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, making a total of $6,435,000.

"4. That the amount to be distributed as quotas to the churches be fixed at the same figure as the current year, $5,360,000, and that the balance of $1,075,000 be raised by gifts from individuals.

"5. That a special fund of $1,000,000 be raised from individuals during the year 1927-28 to assist in the building of church edifices under the direction of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, the affiliated state conventions and the standard city mission societies, class A; that this sum be allocated among the above-mentioned agencies as may be determined by the finance committee in conference with the continuation committee of the associated home mission agencies.

"6. That the Publication Society be allowed the children's day offering the same as this year, adjustment of crediting to be made through the contingent fund, and provision made to give credit to the churches on their quotas.

"7. It is understood that the Board of Education will assume $1000 of the amount requested by the Norwegian conference."

Johnston Myers, representing the committee of arrangements for the next meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention in Chicago thrilled the conference by announcing that Chicago has undertaken to bring together the greatest conference of Baptists ever assembled on the continent, and asked the approval of the conference upon the effort. Approval was unanimously and enthusiastically given, and at once a campaign from ocean to ocean to carry out that purpose will begin.

The general recommendations of the committee of adjustment were adopted and the remainder of the conference was taken up with matters of practical detail. On Wednesday evening the practical question of awakening and enlisting the constituency of the convention to the support of the proposed advance was considered, and Executive Secretary W. H. Bowler advanced a plan for a "Baptist world tour by airplane," of which full information will reach the churches through the state offices. It was unanimously approved and plans discussed in detail for carrying it out. State Director W. F. Harper of Southern California challenged any state convention to equal his convention in the ratio of efficiency in promoting the plan proposed by Secretary Bowler. Edwin Phelps gave the conference another thrill by announcing in behalf of the B. Y. P. U. that the young people are fully organized in the churches behind the denominational program, and will undertake to "sell" the plan to the membership of the churches.

A committee on findings fed the flame of enthusiasm by reporting through its chairman, Francis C. Stifler, "six facts that declare that God has been preparing us for this hour of advance":

The time of reaction following the new world movement has run its natural course and is over; we have started in the direction of a new and permanent advance, with no more need for campaigns and special drives, and are beginning to gather momentum; we have secured complete allegiance to the denominational program; a loyal sense of stewardship has been created among our people, largely by the new world movement; we are training for the new task a new generation of 200,000 Baptist young people; we are preparing to come to the next meeting of the convention in Chicago with budgets adopted in advance, quotas accepted and the new forward movement underwritten. In connection with his report Mr. Stifler read the following telegram from New York, addressed to the conference by Mr. J. L. Kraft, chairman of the Chicago committee of arrangements for the next convention: "This is the time appointed by God for Baptists to go forward. Nothing but progressive plans should be considered. It is with this thought in mind the Northern Baptist Convention committee is planning the world's greatest Baptist convention with 20,000 in attendance. Feeling it is God's plan to go forward, who are we to stand still?"

It is further significant that the finance committee, naturally and always cautious, gave the proposed budget its hearty approval, and that Secy. Frank A. Smith of the convention committee on evangelism was present and expressed his approval with equal cordiality. There is no conflict between evangelism and the budget. They will reinforce each other.

Every man and woman attending the conference holds a place of leadership in denominational affairs. Every one entered into the deliberations with a spirit and effectiveness that deserve mention; space will not permit. At last the convention has in its Board of Missionary Cooperation not merely a board but also full, purposive and happy cooperation.

Condensed Report of W. H. Bowler, Executive Secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation

THE day before the Washington Convention the board last met to face the task committed to it by the denomination. We were aware that the nature and outcome of the Washington Convention would have an important bearing upon promotional work. Therefore, considerable anxiety was felt as to what the outcome would be. It is now generally conceded that the fine spirit of unity and harmony which prevailed throughout the sessions was the earnest of a new day. The reports which have come to us and the personal contacts which we have made in the field, clearly indicate that a better spirit has been created in the denomination by the Washington Convention. This better spirit seems to have reflected itself in our promotional work.

Partly as a result of this better spirit and feeling, three things can be named which indicate a growing improvement. First, there has been a decided increase in the number of churches which have accepted a definite quota; second, there is an increase in the number of churches sending in monthly remittances; third, there has been a marked increase in the number of churches paying their quotas on the basis of one-twelfth each month.

This improvement is reflected in increased receipts. From the first month our receipts have kept constantly in excess of the receipts of a year ago. Better than this, our receipts for this year are in excess of those of two years ago. The receipts from the churches are $75,000 in excess of this period last year. By adding to this the receipts from individuals, the total receipts are raised to $200,000 more than was received up to this time last year.

The improvements in our receipts may be due in part to the better spirit created at Washington, but they also reflect the value of regular and steady emphasis upon fundamental methods. They indicate that steady and systematic cultivation of our churches will produce results. The trend in our giving seems to have turned definitely upward, and this has been brought about not by spectacular or high-pressure methods, but by keeping the emphasis upon regular and normal methods. If we can keep up the steady and proportionate increase in the number of churches which are accepting adequate quotas, translating these quotas into individual responsibility through a well-prepared every-member plan, collecting the pledges through weekly envelopes and forwarding one-twelfth of the money every month, we shall soon witness a steady and gratifying increase in our missionary giving.

At our Washington board meeting most of the time was given to the consideration of the program which would effect the realignment of our promotional program to secure the proper relation of expression through giving to impression in regard to needs and opportunities. The outline of the realignment adopted at Washington became at once the basis of thought and planning on the part of the executive office and staff in the development of details which would accomplish the purpose of the program. The tentative program presented by the officers of the board for this meeting provides for a period of consideration and discussion of plans for a Baptist world tour during January for the purpose of making a stirring impression upon the hearts and minds of our constituency. The plans further provide that while the missionary facts and needs are fresh in the minds of the members of our churches, the churches will be asked to face the question of adopting their quotas for the succeeding year. It is anticipated there will be ample time for full discussion of the details here referred to.

The more one studies the problem of arousing and enlisting the interest of our constituency in the denominational program, the clearer the fact becomes that we must more and more depend upon the personal element as a means of reaching people. The task of challenging people's interest through correspondence or the printed page becomes increasingly difficult in these passing days. We could well afford to give earnest consideration to the matter of how we may make far greater use of people as the medium through which we are going to command the attention of our church members. One of the important questions confronting us is that of developing plans to reach the uninterested by the personal touch of the interested. If our plans are to center around use of the personal element, then we must probably break our whole field up into small units of cultivation and enlist an army of volunteer workers whom we can influence and induce to assume personal responsibility for personal contact with the people in these units. The smallest unit in our denominational work today, next to the individual church, is the association, although in some states the small unit of organization is a district comprising part of an association or composed of two or more associations. It is not important what the small unit is, but in a general way it would be wise to turn to the thorough, systematic cultivation of some such unit as the association through the use of volunteer workers, who after training will actually create personal contacts in these given units. An efficient committee of one or more persons in each small unit could do wonders in putting into effect the denominational program. Our situation compels earnest efforts during this board meeting with a view to developing plans which will result in enlisting our constituency in larger numbers for participation in the work of the kingdom.

All are in earnest accord and deepest sympathy with the evangelistic program now in full swing. We rejoice that such a strong emphasis was given to our evangelistic task at the Washington Convention and that a cooperative committee on evangelism was constituted to lead the denomination in an evangelistic effort. Surely every one of us will be moved to much prayer that real evangelistic passion may move the hearts of our denomination. While we must be busy in the promotional program, we must find time for definite participation in this evangelistic program.

District of Columbia

By HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

ALL our pastors have returned from their summer wanderings and with their churches, are getting down to business. Indications point to a busy year. The note of evangelism is being sounded and there is a pronounced disposition among all our people to line up with the program of the Northern Convention. A general committee is outlining plans which will include days of prayer in the separate churches and the coming together of all the churches in a common season of prayer. A conference on evangelism is being arranged and all our Baptist activities are to be developed with the thought of saving souls, in the expect-tation of a great united campaign to be held in the winter in which all our churches will cooperate.

Our Baptist life has been saddened by the death of Rev. Henry T. Cousins Ph.D., who passed away Sept. 16. Doctor Cousins had held pastorates in England and Canada and had served as a missionary in southern Africa, where he organized a number of Baptist churches. He was the pastor for eight years of the Anacostia church of Washington, later serving for two years as chaplain of the leper colony in Louisiana. Sickness prevented his doing active work the past two years. Doctor Cousins had an excellent mind and was a member of the Society of British Authors and was a fellow and gold medalist of the Society of Science, Art and Literature of London.

The Clarendon (Virginia) church Rev. Perry L. Mitchell, pastor, is forging ahead. During the last year the church offerings amounted to $12,148 of which $4002 was contributed for missions. The Sunday school had an average attendance of 325 and 105 persons united with the church.

Nebraska Letter

By R. R. COON

THE dedication of the church at Smithfield, Rev. Harry E. Wolcott, pastor, took place Sept. 12. State Secretaries Morton and Rev. Roy Larson of Holdrege were present, preaching morning, afternoon and evening. The dedication service was held in the evening; the pastor offered the prayer of dedication. Mr. Wolcott has done a work of great value. Such work, modest but heroic, deserves special mention.

Rev. R. R. Richards has held meetings at Juniata where there were nine conversions, and is now at Dickens. Following this, he has two appointments in Wyoming.—Rev. J. J. Whitman has success at Horace and two outstations with steadily increasing membership, a real Baptist field.—Six were baptized at Gibson, Rev. E. H. Jackson, pastor.—Rev. H. R. Murphy, missionary from Indiana, has done evangelistic work at Wilserville and Lebanon while waiting a call to return to India.—Rev. J. M. Whis has moved from Chambers and become pastor at Battle Creek.—The Oberlin church has called Rev. A. Christophers of Dell Rapids, S. D., who will soon be on the field.—Rev. L. C. Bauer of White Hall, Ill., will conduct revival meetings in the churches of Arthur and Arnold. Evangelist James Kramer of Denver is holding revival meetings at Beatrice.

Rev. and Mrs. O. B. Sarber stopped at Grand Island on their way to Madras, India, where their daughter is a professor in Union college. Mr. Sarber is pastor at Grand Island and during his ministry the church building was completed, a parsonage was secured and a chapel built in the west part of the city. Mr. and Mrs. Sarber planned to sail for Seattle to Yokohama, spend nine days in Japan, then to Shanghai and Hong Kong, China, for two weeks, then to Singapore and to Madras by Nov. This is an endeavor of great privilege and doubtless Mr. and Mrs. Sarber nd profitable and congenial service in the foreign field.

The Grand Island young people held a rare "sunset social" for the older members of the church, about forty in number. Two former pastors, Sarber and Dr. E. F. Jordan, were present, who with Mrs. Sarber gave reminiscent addresses of deep interest.

Doctor Jordan has resigned as vice-president and financial secretary of Grand Island college. Accepting his resignation, the trustees of the college a resolution said: "We appreciate our great sacrificial work for the college in the years of the past, and the heroic term of service for the institution you are now finishing." As pastor in the city, as president, and as financial secretary, he has had marked success.

The Nebraska Convention meets with the First church, Omaha, Dr. A. A. DeMarne, pastor, Oct. 13-17. Among those who will give addresses are Drs. J. A. Massee, S. G. Neil, P. C. Wright, A. M. Petty, Miss Alice Brimson, Missionary A. Curtis.

It is the desire to make this a great evangelistic conference. For twenty-five years the writer has made it his practice to attend the Nebraska Convention, and be present from the first day to the last. If every pastor would be present it would be a convention long to be remembered.

Boston Letter

By CHARLES H. WATSON
First Church, Boston.

Rich in historical associations, so conspicuous in the Boston Baptist brotherhood, the doings of the old First church are sure to compel general interest. Whoever the church calls to its leadership will be certain of a wide welcome, and will find his labors awakening sympathetic expectation. At a large meeting held Sept. 18, a unanimous call to the pastorate was extended to Dr. Harold Major, of Dallas, Tex. Doctor Major has been the summer supply minister for the last two years, and acquaintance as preacher and pastor ripened sufficiently to make him an attractive candidate for the vacant pulpit.

Doctor Major, though a northerner by birth, is a southerner by education, pastoral experience, and theological attitude. He was graduated from the Southern Baptist seminary at Louisville after ten years in business, and as many in prominent pastorates in Georgia, Tennessee and Texas. He comes to the First church at a time when the success that may be won will be peculiarly his own, both by pulpit ability, and by adaptable leadership during a changing, yet promising opportunity. He will have the warm welcome of the entire Baptist brotherhood.

Rev. Charles R. McNally, who has acceptably filled the interim between two pastorates, has proved himself in spirit and ability, a fine leader and a strong church.

Doctor Massee on Evangelism.

By a happy plan of the program committee of our ministers' conference, we early in the fall an inspirational address from Dr. J. C. Massee on "Evangelism." Such an address from him was fitting, especially after recent denominational developments. Those familiar with Doctor Massee's masterful method and skill found all of their expectations realized in the moving speech. He evidently believes in evangelism and therefore speaks. He has the old confidence and the rich, accumulated experience that go with what has always been accepted as the gospel evangel that brings conviction and conversion. The crowds attendant upon his ministry, and the faithful preaching they hear and respond to make him an outstanding Christian force in the city.

Doctor Massee's pronounced attitude toward our chosen leaders, and the great work committed to Baptists has exerted wide and heartening influence for good. His deep convictions are well known, and he has not changed them, but has chosen the way of pronounced Christian cooperation, instead of the waste of contentions among workers and brethren. What except the best for us all can come from such a course? Can the best come from an opposite one?

A Good Old Custom.

For over forty years, the Baptist ministers of Boston and suburbs have observed the custom of giving a banquet "send-off" to brethren called to serve in other sections of the country. It is a good custom, because it gives public honor to a brother at the outset of his new opportunity for service, and puts him in good heart and confidence in facing his inevitable problems. Sept. 27 at the City club, Boston, we gave a farewell luncheon to Rev. Harold L. Abbott, of Maplewood, who goes to the Fifth church, Philadelphia. A large and happy company uttered God-speed and good-will.

Doctor Gilkey and the Ministers.

The ministers began their meetings with strength. Dr. J. M. English, in the opening address on "Our Great Baptist Educators," gave the young ministers a delineation of our old-time giants that was graphic and informing. Then came Dr. J. C. Massee's timely and moving address on "Evangelism" that found great acceptability.

The third meeting, Sept. 27, brought Dr. Charles W. Gilkey, of Chicago, with his vivid world view of missions from the oriental angle. It was a sound and convincing presentation that the whole denomination should hear. Specifically it looked at our western Christianity through the eyes of India, whither Doctor Gilkey had gone to deliver the Barrows lectures. He carried to them a great message, but to us he brought a greater because a more needed one. He proved that while we have sought to bear to the East a Christian gospel, it has been heavily discounted by our own un-Christian faults. The keen oriental has come to discard the husk of it—Christianity, and accept the kernel—Christ, and the husk does not remind the oriental of the kernel. We have become so preoccupied with our "race superiority," war relish, and materialistic money worship, that we became blind just when the oriental was opening his eyes. Now that we are seen and understood, there must be an entire readjustment of our western Christianity if it is to convince that it is of Jesus Christ, and draw all men to him.

In the face of such a vast world transformation as that now going on, while we are made humble and self-conscious, a message like Doctor Gilkey's corrects, reproves, and finds no gainsaying.

Journalism and the Big Fight.

It was the morning after the great modern sacrament to brutality at Philadelphia. On his way to the city with a neighbor, the writer called attention to the shrieking front page headlines, and the innumerable columns of detailed description of the orgy of mud and blood, as one more proof that journalism was demoralized, and demoralizing. The neighbor, keenly intelligent from the journalistic viewpoint, gently parried and qualified the sweeping indictment. After he had reached his desk, by way of completing the conversation, he sent the following note:

"Dear Doctor Watson: I cannot let the thought go by without saying that in my belief no stronger sermon inculcating clean and regular living to young men could be found than in Dempsey slumped on his corner stool, his face hampered, his body ripped to a bloody blurb, and decisively beaten, all because he put three years into movie society, Broadway nights, and worry over a broken contract. Seven years ago his iron fists and good nerves put down that giant Willard—a David and Goliath affair. Ulysses ran a man through and we applaud him, but that is in the classic tale. There are 400 worse vices than jarring a man's solar plexus and mauling his face."

That genial, non-pugilistic neighbor had something in his punch. Nevertheless, a goodly segment of the indictment of modern journalism will have to stand.

Indianapolis Newsletter

By FREDERIC ARTHUR HAYWARD
The Indianapolis Association.

THE Indianapolis Association held a profitable two-day session Sept. 21-22. The association motto was "I determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified" (I Cor. 2-2.). This one hundredth anniversary was prayerfully planned and as prayerfully observed. The addresses stressed spiritual values rather than the review of a long historical period. A well prepared paper was read by Miss Della Dearborn on "One Hundred Years of Baptist Fellowship," and an address was given on "The Forward Look" by the writer. Living echoes brought forth happy remembrance of past years and it was a pleasure to hear three messengers who had been members of the association for more than fifty years speak of the sacred years. More than fifteen people were present who had been working with the association for twenty-five years, among them the pastor of the Tuxedo church, whose message compared the present ideals with days gone by. The comment of the messengers was unanimous that this was the best and most spiritual associational gathering ever held. The closing service was a visualization of the new day. The B. Y. P. U. rally brought together 787 young people representing the various societies in attendance. More than 300 were turned away and it is estimated that nearly 1100 people came for the closing hours of the one hundredth association.

Our Heads Are Bowed in Prayer.

Death has crept into our ministerial ranks so often that we find an unusual sympathy among the group. We have met together for prayer in some cases. We have gone quietly to the home or church in other cases, and have waited on the Lord while a "household of the minister" has been in the shadows. Our heads are now bowed in prayer for Rev. E. G. Shouse of the Crooked Creek church. This growing community in the northwest end of the city has been led by this heroic pastor. As preacher and lecturer he has traveled widely and has a host of friends. Since he became pastor of this church the interests have increased. A new addition is under way which will include rooms for the department of religious education. While in the path of duty Mr. Shouse was stricken and has been unconscious for more than two weeks. He is near the "shadow lines." His friends ask for courage and faith from the Father in this hour.

The Acton Church Will Rebuild

A short time ago fire demolished the brick building of the old Acton church. A few straggling bricks tell the story of the loss. These the children have cleaned and piled for the new house of God. Committees are at work on plans for designing and financing the new building. A special drive for a "cash payment" of $2000 by January 1 was launched Sept. 26. Rev. J. H. Julian is pastor.

Fellowship Week at Garfield Park.

This young church had a fellowship week and indicated the joy of an aggressive program. The various nights were given over to the young people, the men, the ladies, the church school and the community. Following "the seven-day services" it was expected the every-member canvas would be completed. The committee planned to undertake this important task by beginning at the list of noncontributors and finishing the campaign with a Victory Sunday, Oct. 3. Baptisms were expected on this Victory day as well as the financial statements. Pastor Greenfield is a wise leader.

The Pastor's Retreat.

The average layman might well ask as did one in this city, "Why are the ministers retreating? To whom are they obligated?" His idea was that it was a sort of pay-up campaign after which additional obligations could be incurred. It might be interesting to get the reactions of other people when such happy phrases in the newspapers suggest retirement for spiritual values. Our church vocabulary needs reediting for the unchurched mass.

It is a custom fairly well established that the ministers of all communions in this city go to the boy scout reservation and for one day give themselves to meditation and prayer. An outstanding Bible student and leader is procured for special messages. Business meetings and fellowship hours help bring about common view-points and cooperation. The pastor's retreat was held Sept. 27. About 200 were in attendance. Dinner was served by the Indianapolis church federation.

The First Church Bible Studies.

The Book of Nehemiah, becomes new under the leadership of Dr. Frederick E. Taylor, First church, and the mid-week services take on a new bent. For several months this church has laid emphasis on this study. Doctor McKay, associate pastor, led in the studies of the general epistles of the New Testament during the summer. The pastors in other churches have programs of this type and the appeal indicates a tendency toward deeper spiritual values.

Maine Notes

By E. C. WHITTEMORE

THE Penobscot Association held a largely attended mid-year session, Sept. 23, with the church in Howland, of which Rev. George F. Currier is pastor.

Rev. O. E. Thomas of Bradley preached a significant and spiritual sermon. Rev. H. A. Welch of Brewer, moderator, strongly presented the work of "Recruiting the Boys." Evangelists Willa Ferguson and E. A. Davis helped in the program. Pastor Robison of Bangor, Pastors Whittier of Corinth, Bullen of Lee, Winsor of Bangor, Smith of Pasadumkeag, and Terrill of Cardville, contributed to an interesting and profitable meeting. The missionary address was by Doctor Whittemore, secretary of the state board of missionary cooperation.

An excellent dinner was served with the hospitality usual to the Howland church. The church in this thriving manufacturing center is to be congratulated on its pastor, its plant, its opportunity and its spirit.

AS LYRE and the musician,
As thought and spoken word,
As rose and fragrant odors,
As flute and breath accord,
So deep the bond that binds me
To Christ, my Lord.

As mother and her baby,
As traveller lost and guide,
As oil and flickering lamp-flame,
Are each to each allied,
Life of my life, Christ bindeth
Me to his side.

As lake and streaming rainfall,
As fish and water clear,
As sun and gladdening dayspring,
In union close appear,
So Christ and I are holden
In bonds how dear!

The service of the small church to the larger and to general kingdom interests, was exemplified when, at Dexter, by unanimous vote of council, Leroy Campbell, son of the little church at Clifton, was ordained its pastor.

Under strong spiritual impression the boy Campbell began to preach almost from his conversion. He sought preparation for the ministry and was graduated at Harvard this year. He was called to the Dexter church and his ministry already is producing excellent results.

At the ordination service the ordaining prayer was offered by Rev. S. E. Frohock of Milo; the sermon was given by Dr. E. C. Whittemore of Waterville; the charge to the candidate, by Rev. C. S. Roddy of Cambridge; the charge to the church, by Rev. A. M. Winsor of Bangor; welcome to the association, by Rev. S. E. Frohock. Rev. J. L. Sanders of Dexter was clerk of the council.

Regional Conference in Rhode Island

By A. W. CLEAVES

THE first of the thirty-eight regional conferences on evangelism which are to be held throughout the field of the Northern Baptist Convention was with the churches of Rhode Island and southeastern Massachusetts and was held Sept. 13, in the historic First church, Providence, Dr. Arthur W. Cleaves, pastor. It was a great occasion and the pastors and church workers who crowded the conference hall at all three sessions report that they are engaged carrying to their own churches something of its power and suggestion.

Many local pastors had part in the program, either giving addresses on some phase of the subject or presenting methods which have proved of value to the churches in the carrying on of a consistent evangelistic work. Every session had in it prayer and devotional periods characterized by warmth of spirit and renewed consecration.

From without came three speakers each making a contribution without which the conference could hardly have left the impression it did. Rev. Frank M. Goodchild stirred the congregation with an address on "Prayer Power." Rev. J. C. Massee spoke on "The Immediacy of the Evangelistic Task" and again on "The Unfailing Passion." On such themes Doctor Massee is at his best and is certain by his own passion to carry with him the hearts of his listeners. Rev. H. F. Stilwell spoke twice each time with impressiveness and suggestion.

The thought of the churches in this region is being increasingly given to the matter of evangelism. Associations and other groups are featuring the subject in their meetings. The conference held at Providence has given impetus to the whole movement. If the spirit manifest here prevails in subsequent meetings, it would seem possible to predict for the winter one of the greatest gatherings in the churches that the Northern Baptist Convention has known.

SUNBEAMS through my western window

At the break of day,
Waken me, surprised and wondering,
Till I glance across the way,
And see my neighbor's window-panes
Aglow with sunrise glee,
Flashing calls to merriment
Across the street to me.

When this happy day is ending
And sunset clouds are bright,
I hope my western window will Reflect a rosy light
Through my neighbor's darkening windows,
That face the other way,
And share with them the beauty
Of the sun's last lingering ray.

Oregon's Evangelistic Conference

By G. G. LAUGHLIN

DR. T. J. Villers and the writer were asked by the committee of fifteen to act as a special committee for an evangelistic conference in Oregon. The state convention committee on evangelism co-operated with us in arranging the program. The conference was held Sept. 21-22 in the White Temple church, Portland. Letters and programs were sent to all pastors informing them of the conference and urging their attendance. The traveling expenses of the pastors were paid by the Home Mission Society and the state convention. Ninety per cent of the pastors of the state attended the conference. Dr. O. C. Wright, state secretary, joined with the pastors in pronouncing the conference one of the best he ever attended. The finest fellowship prevailed throughout the conference. Much time was taken for intercessory prayer.

Tuesday morning was set apart for Bible exposition and prayer. Pastor J. E. Thomas of Calvary church, Portland,

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Chicago.

"We think so highly of THE BAPTIST that we utilize it at the midweek meeting and constantly bring its messages to the people." So writes Rev. L. I. Hansen, pastor of the First church of Alameda, Calif. Every church in the Northern Baptist fellowship could profitably follow the example of this wise leader.

"Enclosed find $2.50 to renew my subscription to THE BAPTIST. I know of but one other member in this church who takes the paper. I think it would be a good plan to send a solicitor to these churches to wake them up to the merits of the denominational paper. It ought to be in every member's home." This from a church west of Chicago. What does that church have a pastor for anyway?

"Why not pep up the pastor to follow the example of this real leader in an Ohio city: 'Before long I shall fill our church calendar with words about THE BAPTIST and push for its circulation.' And he does. He carries on a snappy 'go-get-'em' campaign of education and lines up his subscriptions which eventually mean a larger ministry in that church. The reason this Ohio pastor wins is that he adds 'push' to his words. So many folk just rely on 'words.'

"Here is a modern proverb that ought to be pasted in your hat: 'If your foot slips, you may regain your balance. If your tongue slips you can never recall your words. But if your subscription to THE BAPTIST expires, you can always renew it.' $2.50 a year please. Do not wait for an expiration notice. Your tongue might slip when it comes. We have heard one or two that did. Oh boy, what they said was a plenty. Keep away from temptation.

"Some one has written a little verse, entitled, 'When Mother Reads Aloud.' It runs, 'When mother reads aloud, I long for noble deeds to do—to help the right, redress the wrong; it seems so easy to be strong; so simple to be true. O thick and fast the visions crowd my eyes, when mother reads aloud.' There are bits of humor, of poetry, stories on the page devoted to 'The Chimney Corner,' and Margaret Applegarth's 'Boys and Girls' page in every issue of THE BAPTIST, that make ideal selections for mother to read to the children. There are news items, missionary stories, and bits of world news that with a little adaptation can be read to the little ones. Are your children worth bothering with? Think it over.

"Rev. R. W. Edmonson, pastor of the Calvary church, Akron, Ohio, says, 'I believe that one of the best things I can do as I start the eighth year in my pastorate with this church is to renew my subscription to THE BAPTIST and to advance it into the future. The church had a membership of 151 in 1919 when I began here; 474 new members have been added in the seven years. Gifts for missions through denominational agencies have risen from $500 a year to over $1500 last year. Our goal for May 1, 1927, is $2000 and we think we shall reach it. I enjoy the 'Here, There and Everywhere,' columns of the paper.' There is only one thing we should add to this letter; as we see it, the next 'best' thing for the pastor to do is to enlist his whole church in a reading campaign using THE BAPTIST in every home, then remain seven years longer and watch the record mount year after year. It would. Other pastors, please copy.

"The office boy will now recite a gentle gloom chaser for the refreshing of an who may be wearying in well-doing:

'If you can trust when others faint and falter,
Or stand and serve when others flee away,
Unmoved by either Jezebel or Ahab,
Remaining faithful every livelong day;
If you can keep your courage up and boost it,
Yes, boost THE BAPTIST as few have ever done;
You'll prove yourself a very noble human,
And, what is more, you'll be a saint, my son.'

led in the first Bible exposition, using the Fifty-first Psalm. He presented it as a model prayer for a revival, a revival of the restoration of joy, of the Holy Spirit, of consecration to service, and a conversion of souls to God. These searching words of David's prayer sent the assembly to its knees in a remarkable season of prevailing prayer. This was a fine preparation for the conference that followed. Space will not permit a review of all the addresses, the devotional hours, and the consecration periods.

Tuesday afternoon three subjects were discussed: "Evangelism Essential to the Life of the Church," by Dr. W. L. Eaton of Medford; "The Motive of Evangelism," by Rev. Neil J. Barnes of Bend; and "The Holy Spirit in Evangelism," by Rev. C. M. Cline of Vancouver, Wash. Doctor Eaton declared that the is no excuse for a church to exist if it were not evangelistic, and that it could not exist long except in name. Pastor Barnes assured us that the "motive" was couched in the greatest of words, love. Pastor Cline reminded us that Jesus began the work of evangelism and then sent the Holy Spirit to carry it on, and that there could be no success without him.

In the evening Rev. W. H. Robins of Pendleton spoke on "Enlisting the Whole Church in Evangelism." He questioned his audience and found that no one knew of such a church. He emphasized the importance of such an objective for all our churches. Dr. C. L. Lawin of Eugene brought the closing address on "The Immediacy of the Evangelistic Task," building his message around five words: meaning, method, motive, measure, motion—or motive power in evangelism.

Wednesday morning Dr. W. E. Henry of McMinnville gave an exposition of Paul's word, "power," in Ephesians, pointing out in a word study the might of power; the method of power; the mystery of power; the motive of power; and the manifestation of power. This inspiring message gave us a good start for the closing day's conference. "Evangelism Process" was discussed in fifteen minute addresses under three sub-topics: (1) The teaching part, Dr. E. H. Shanks of Salem; (2) The prayer part, Rev. E. A. Gottberg of Astoria; (3) The personal work part, Rev. E. T. Starkey of Oregon City. Evangelist M. G. Bentley gave a practical address on "How to Do Personal Work." Dr. T. Milliken, director of religious education, closed the forenoon session in a helpful quiet-hour service. Brotherly kindness, taken from the First Epistle to John, was the key-note of his message. A symposium of five-minute addresses was part of the afternoon program. "Making a Survey," G. G. Laughlin, director of evangelism; "Giving Institution Once a Week," Rev. G. H. Harrison; "Evangelistic Committee in Every Church," Dr. O. C. Wright; "Five-Minute Men in Local Church," Rev. A. B. Baltz; "An Evangelistic Campaign in Every Church," Rev. A. E. Davis; "Converting Results," Dr. Frank A. Matthews. "How to Enlist Every Church in This Campaign" was discussed in brief addresses under associational evangelism, by associational chairmen. Reports of service and outline of plans for future work showed splendid work done in the various associations. Dr. H. L. Kempson, associate pastor of the Hinson Memorial church, Portland, gave a helpful message on "Consecration," and Mr. M. Mansell Wilder, director of music at the White Temple church, closed the afternoon service with a message on "Music in Evangelism," after which members of the White Temple choir sang two selections, then he played the pipe organ and chimes.

Mr. F. G. Leary, president of the Oregon state convention and of the Billy Sunday men's club, conducted a laymen's meeting Wednesday evening. He was assisted by seven members of the club who spoke and sang. They reproduced a gospel service which they have conducted in many of the churches. It was a good example of how laymen can be used in evangelism and other phases of church work.

Other devotional leaders during the conference were Rev. R. B. Thomas; Rev. E. J. Dodson; Rev. W. C. Driver. Those who presided at sessions were Rev. W. L. Riley; Rev. C. S. Tunnell; Rev. C. F. Mosher; Rev. W. P. Osgood; Rev. A. J. Ware; and Evangelist G. G. Laughlin. Dr. T. J. Villers closed the conference with a soul-stirring message on, "What to Do When You Go Home." He used the following outline for both large and small churches: 1. Build an evangelistic fire in the pulpit; 2. Call the whole church to prayer; 3. Establish an evangelistic committee in every church; 4. Open instruction classes in personal work; 5. Carefully select a prospect list; 6. Draw the gospel net regularly; 7. Prayerfully observe decision days.

Oregon Baptists returned home with a new determination to bring evangelism to the front.

Oregon State Convention.

The annual meeting of the Oregon Baptist State Convention was held in July at Linfield college, McMinnville. We are proud of Linfield college. Doctor Riley gave an encouraging report at our recent evangelistic conference of the new enrolment and outlook for the year. Linfield needs better equipment and we believe will soon get it. Reports at the state convention meeting showed a healthy growth in baptism and additions to the churches. Secy. O. C. Wright is leading a Baptist host of 20,000 to new heights of achievement. We have the "Wright" man in the right place. Dr. W. T. Milliken, director of religious education, and Miss Louise Hunderup, elementary director and convention field worker, are rendering inestimable service in their lines of work. Let us support them more enthusiastically than ever before.

Following the meeting of the state convention a fine summer assembly was held at Linfield college under the leadership of Doctor Milliken. Young people came from different parts of the state and did splendid work. Every pastor and church worker ought to begin now to boost for next year's assembly.

The Saving Sense

"Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" asked the minister.

Gently the father placed the slender hand of the bride in that of the bashful groom. "Take her, my boy," he exclaimed, his face aglow. "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Is there nothing new under the sun? Yes, in wedding write-ups, at least. From the Evanston Weekly is culled the following:

"The bride, on the arm of her brother, Miller Perrin, was adorned in the usually beautiful garb prescribed for the occasion, her dress being a white crepe affair which seemed to be simply a part of the bride, so prettily was it designed.

"Rev. E. King, formerly connected with Emerson street 'Y,' served as best man for Mr. Taylor, who strode forth in the conventional evening attire."

"Are you a fiction writer?"

"Yes, that's my business."

"O, won't you think of a good name for my new police dog?"—Life.

"My dear boy, how did you come to fall into the river?" asked Johnny's dripping rescuer who had just pulled him out of the water.

"I didn't come to fall in the river," blubbered Johnny. "I came to catch some fish."

Says the Churchman: The following is to the credit of an old colored church member in Alabama: "Folks make me tired representin' Satan as runnin' after dem to tempt dem. De truth is, my friend, dere is so many people pullin' at the debil's coat tails dat he ain't got much time to chase anybody."

Look out for bugs. Dr. Austin H. Clark of the Smithsonian institution is quoted as saying that more than 600,000 kinds of insects are known, and at least three million varieties unknown. Who counted the unknown ones? Anyway he says that they are being catalogued at the rate of 6000 kinds every year, and that 500 years hence the work will still be going on. Automobiles are helping to carry them about and are scattering them at a rate never before imagined. Ugh!

"Light Has Come" is the title of a booklet of unusual excellence written by Rev. Thomas E. Bartlett and issued from the Bible Store, 144 Westminster st., Providence, R. I. "Okada must go" is the cry of Japanese students, as reported. He is minister of education in Japan. He dislikes the social sciences and is strong for military training. Many of the students disagree with him. He has changed the name from military training to cultural training, but the thing keeps on smelling the same way. The students show pacifism. Influential papers sympathize with them. Democracy is in the air. An American reporter in Japan cannot understand such a tendency. He thinks that somebody must have been putting dangerous notions in the students' heads. Democratic tendencies puzzle a good many Americans.

Notes on the Lesson for October 17

MOSES HONORED IN HIS DEATH

Lesson Text: Dent. 32:45-52, 34:5-8. Golden Text: Psa. 116:15

From the River Nile to Mount Nebo was a short journey in terms of years, but a long journey when the distance is measured in accomplishments. The childhood of Moses was full of dramatic interest and much of his life reads like a romance. His death also was a thrilling event.

The Romance of Dying.

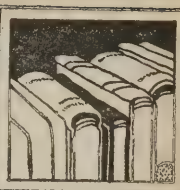

Some people appear to live too long. They disintegrate long before they die. The mind atrophies, the memory fails, the will weakens, the emotions dry up; but the body continues to function with unerring regularity. There can be no romance to the dying of such a person. Moses died at an hour when all his faculties were intact and when all his bodily functions were unimpaired. He went to his death as one goes on a vacation to the mountains. His work was finished, his task was done, his day was at an end so far as this world was concerned. Another was ready to take up the work where Moses laid it down and carry it on. The promised land he would see from a distance, but a better land he would enter. There was romance even in his disappointment, if he really felt disappointed at not being permitted to enter Canaan, because his disappointment was swallowed up in the anticipation of going home to be with God forever. There was also romance in his farewell and in his last words to the people he had loved and led. He laid down the principle of obedience as the way of life and prosperity. "Trust and obey, for there's no other way to be happy." Romance surrounded his sepulcher. The rabbis' translate the words, "Moses died according to the word of Jehovah," "Moses died by the kiss of Jehovah." There is romance in dying if one knows how to die and where to die as Moses seemed to know.

The Regret of Dying.

Christian hymns are often filled with the drab color of death. The fleeting breath, eyelids closed in death, death's cold sullen stream, and other somber figures of speech have been used by poets to take all the romance out of dying. Seldom do we find in either hymn or sermons death pictured as a mountain-top experience. The Dead sea speaks of death, but Mount Nebo does not seem to be in that category. Yet when God would take Moses away by death it was not to the Dead sea he sent him but to that peak ten miles north of the Dead sea rising to an altitude of 3500 feet. Why should Christians have less of romance in their dying than Moses? Did not Christ destroy death and bring life and immortality to light? "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" Thank be unto God who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ our Lord. Let thy regret at dying be lost for the Christian in the romance of death.

New Books

Russell H. Conwell and His Work, by Agnes Rush Burr. Philadelphia: John C. Winston Company. $1.50.

It is enough to say that Miss Burr was intimately acquainted with Doctor Conwell, that much of the story is told in his own words, and that he personally endorsed the book before he died. It is, therefore, not merely biographical; it is largely his autobiography and his interpretation of life. And life to him was far richer and many-sided than to most men, for he holds easily a place among the select few of the world's greatest men. Here he is as he lived and in his multitudinous contacts with men, grand as a monarch, genial, humane, friendly, simple in his New England home and solid as the New England granite. Many of the famous Conwell stories are here, with sketches of lectures and sermons, and particularly, "Acres of Diamonds."

The Gospel That Jesus Preached and the Gospel for Today, by A. T. Cadoux, D.D. New York: Macmillan. $1.75.

This is a well written and sincere attempt to show that traditional Christianity has lost its hold on thinking people because it has substituted a theory of the forgiveness of sin through faith in the death of Jesus for his gospel. Jesus, Doctor Cadoux says, preached forgiveness without any condition of faith in his death. The gospel of Jesus is "essentially the gospel of the kingdom of God, and among the many things that Jesus said about fitness for the kingdom of God there is nothing like the demand for faith in his death which the traditional gospel makes the one essential condition of salvation." The other element in Jesus' teaching is the fatherhood, the goodness, the holy love of God, which repudiates the traditional doctrine of endless future hell. "The relation of the life and death of Jesus to the forgiveness of sin is that they give us the assurance of God's goodness which we need to make real repentance (or change of mind) possible, and that when we repent, God forgives. If we believe that God forgives those who repent, there is no problem of forgiveness, but rather one of repentance, and repentance depends directly upon an adequate knowledge of him against whom we have sinned. And the gospel of Jesus is the gift of his thought of God to those who look upon him honestly, to whom he thus 'gives repentance.' . . . Repentance is made possible to us by the concrete whole of all that Jesus was. His teaching convicts; his manhood shames; in his hope we find hope; his suffering breaks the power of fear and pride; his love overcomes our selfishness and turns us to himself."

The nature of Jesus is seen in his "sheer moral and spiritual supremacy." The virgin birth is rejected, for evolution makes the miraculous origin of Jesus untenable; yet the author in conclusion says that, "Jesus becomes the central object of our worship and adoration." "But if prayer is a fellow worship with God and an attempt to will the will of God, then Jesus is everything to us in our prayers."

This book is an honest attempt to present the gospel from the standpoint of liberalism.

Concerning the Soul, by James Alexander Robertson, professor of New Testament language, literature and theology in United Free church, Aberdeen, Scotland. New York: Doran. $2 net.

A book entirely devoted to the origin, nature and destiny of the human soul. The reputation of the author as preacher, teacher and writer guarantees interest in anything he writes, but the objective and contents of this volume are an added assurance of its literary and spiritual value. Mark the contents of a few of the chapters: "Is there a soul?" "What is it?" "Whence came it?" "Its earthly sojourn," "Whither goes it?" "Its heavenly tabernacle," "Its task in the hereafter," "Lost souls," "The souls' reunion in the hereafter," "Do the souls of the dead ever return?" It is manifest that such questions have in them the present day nerve points of interest. The author is an evolutionist "in good and regular standing," and withal thoroughly scriptural and evangelical. His quotations from other famous authors are many; we could wish he had named some of them and the works from which he quotes. His views and conclusions on the destiny of lost souls are not dogmatic and he is frank enough to confess agnosticism. In some of the discussions he is "a wee bit" speculative, occasionally fanciful, but always sane and rational. He does not economize on rhetorical periods; but he is never flamboyant or extravagant. We have read the book Growing a Soul, by Matthew T. Andrews. Philadelphia: Judson Press. $1.25.

Doctor Andrews, a Southern Baptist preacher, reveals in every page his warm, evangelistic spirit. The sermons which are sane, evangelical and practical, always conform to the best homiletical models. The book takes its title from the first sermon in the series. Some of the sermons were preached on special occasions and some were produced in his regular ministry, but all reveal the observant mind of the preacher and demonstrate the wide range which marks the modern pulpit. In spite of some minor defects, such as overworking the late war as sermon material, the book is a valuable contribution to religious literature.

The Mystery of Painlessness, by Frank Ballard. New York: Revell. 75 cents.

This book is a courageous attempt to solve the problem of suffering in the world by the constructive method of propounding a greater question, namely, the problem of health. Four chapters deal with the problem of suffering, the marvel of daily life and the divine secret. It is the aim of the author to show how the so-called mystery of suffering is zero when compared with the more astounding mystery of painlessness. Gladstone died of cancer. While he was suffering, a friend expressed his sympathy in these words, "Mr. Gladstone, I fear you have had much pain these last six months." "Yes, my friend, I have. But that is no reason why I should forget that I have had eighty-six years free from pain." This story tells the message of the book.

Principles of Religious Education, by Earle E. Emme and Paul R. Stevick. New York: Macmillan. $1.75.

For comprehensiveness, clarity and sanity, here is something to cherish. Human nature, aims, means, methods and leadership are discussed with a freshness, a freedom, a carefulness of thought and a fitness of popular phrasing that make the perusal a delight. I am thinking what a pleasure it would be to use the outline here given as the basis for a series of studies in a summer assembly, with a class composed of ministers and of fairly mature teachers. The best that mankind knew of psychology, sociology, theology, Biblical criticism and religious experience up to January, 1926, is placed under tribute, dished up and served with artistic skill. Though not a technical treatise on the philosophy of education, it does introduce the ordinary teacher to the best results of technical and philosophical inquiry.

Bible Dramas in the Pulpit, by Perry J. Stackhouse. Philadelphia: Judson Press. $1.25.

This is a series of eleven drama sermons preached in the First Baptist church, Chicago, of which Doctor Stackhouse is pastor. The sermons were enthusiastically received and some of them were heard over the radio by appreciative listeners. Request for their publication led to the book which we are here reviewing. Not many preachers have the dramatic imagination which makes possible Bible dramas in the pulpit. And yet the reading of this book will stimulate the imagination and reveal to some who read it their own latent power to give color and perspective to many stories found only in tabloid form in the Bible. There may be other books like this in print, but if there are, "Bible Dramas" by Stackhouse will not suffer in comparison.

World friendship days will be Nov. 28-29 in Chicago. An elaborate program is in preparation with such speakers as Revs. Frederick Lynch, Henry A. Atkinson and Walter Van Kirk; Messrs. Fred B. Smith, Linley V. Gordon and Harry N. Holmes; and Miss Lucy Gardner of London.

Commercial Attache Chester Lloyd Jones in Paris has reported to the department of commerce that American tourists in France spent approximately $226,160,000 in 1925, according to the French estimates, for travel, shelter, food and other purchases, exceeding by 50 per cent the "visible exports" of France to the United States. The American tourist expenditures are known in international trade as "invisible exports" as distinguished from visible exports of merchandise, precious metals, etc.

The cigaret must go, but not yet. Mayor Ralph S. Bauer has declared war on cigaret smoking by Lynn, Mass., teachers, both men and women. In a statement he announced that they must make new year's resolutions to abandon the habit or resign their positions. He will offer a resolution to this effect before the school board and admits he expects to have some difficulty in passing the order.

A political revolt of undetermined result is on in Illinois. A good many people in that state are unable to swallow the bolus offered in the senatorial nominations of both of the principal parties, and Hugh S. McGill, president of the National Council of Religious Education, has announced himself as an independent republican candidate. Mr. McGill is acknowledged on all hands to be a man of the highest character and well qualified for the senatorship. Prohibition is supposed to be the chief issue of the campaign. Perhaps the true issue is the political competency of the people of Illinois.

Twenty-six churches and religious organizations participated in a series of union Sunday evening open-air services in Springfield, Ill., during the past summer. Seven services were held, with audiences of nearly 2000 persons attending each service, with weather conditions permitting. During recent years the Springfield plan of open-air services has become widely known because of the quality of the programs provided, which have included preaching by some of America's most noted preachers, together with an attractive musical program consisting of selections by one of the best known bands in central Illinois, and singing by a large chorus directed by Prof. R. V. Stratton. At the final service a portion of Handel's "Messiah" was rendered.

Incidents reported here and there give rise to the hope that the decline in missionary giving has "touched bottom" both among Baptists and in other denominations. Occasional tendencies to recovery are reported, perhaps with growing frequency.

Frederick W. Peabody appeals to the Christian ministers of the country to arouse a moral sentiment for the cancellation of the war debts of other countries to this country. He is tremendously, passionately, urgent. He thinks that the contrary course is equivalent to our being "sold, betrayed, dishonored" and our unborn children "shamed." His reasons will not convince all. It is the argument that our debtors fought our war two years before we entered the conflict.

Brodsky's synagogue of Kiev, the largest synagogue in the Ukraine, was officially turned into an artisans' club when the Kiev soviet handed the keys of the synagogue to the management of the artisans' club, reports the Jewish Daily Bulletin. To celebrate this event, groups of Jewish artisans and workingmen demonstrated before the soviet building, expressing their gratitude for the action of the communist authorities. The red flag was raised over the synagogue building, indicating that it has become a building housing a communist institution. A special committee was appointed to take over the property belonging to the synagogue.

It is said that a manuscript of the Bible 1000 years old has been discovered in an ancient synagogue in Bukhara.

In those states where referenda in legal form and with legal effect antagonistic to prohibition are pending, the W. C. T. U. is urging the temperance people to go to the polls and vote.

The National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People advises colored voters to quiz candidates for the senatorship of the United States on three points, namely, the Dyer anti-lynching bill, the disfranchisement of colored voters in the South and segregation in the government departments at Washington, and to mass their votes accordingly.

It is reported that movements are in progress to raise endowments for the Christian Leader and for the Congregationalist. The Herald of Gospel Liberty declares that it has reached the limit beyond which it cannot long continue unless practical steps are taken to finance it more adequately. The Southern Baptist state papers are engaged in subscription contests in which the state play against one another for the largest gain.

Dr. Harry F. Ward wrote to inquire "under what clause of what treaty the United States claims the right to patrol Chinese internal waters with its warships." The department of state replied citing the particular treaties and their provisions giving such right. Later reports indicate that the government is not disposed to press that right and is carefully avoiding any act that might seem to be an unwarranted or offensive intervention in Chinese affairs.

"Dr. E. Y. Mullins, president of the Southern Baptist Theology Seminary, Louisville, and president of the Baptist World Alliance, is one of the mightiest leaders in Christendom," declares the Western Christian Advocate. "He is leading the forces of the new alignment—that remarkable communion. We believe his policy should be commended; we also urge the members of that great body of believers to give him undivided and enthusiastic support. The Baptist World Alliance is a great conception. It should prove to be a great organization, an indissoluble brotherhood, so linked together, so joined in union, so formed in one faith that it should prove itself able to support the weak, the intelligent to direct the ignorant, and the seeing to guide the blind." It is a great hour for that denomination. We believe it is rising to its opportunity and standing together while it enters the greatest period in its history."

Cotton mills are seeking the South. The Coolidge mill, the largest complete manufacturing unit in the Amoskeag plant at Manchester, N. H., has closed down indefinitely.

They are celebrating the heroism displayed in connection with the fearful storm in Florida by a Jewish sexton of a synagogue who risked his life to rescue the "Holy Scrolls."

Moody Bible institute is offering a new course for preparing specialists in beginners, primary, junior, intermediate, senior adult department work. This is said to be the first training expressly for department specialization to be offered in any school of the country. The new course will cover a period of one year, 610 hours, and all graduates will be awarded a certificate of religious education.

In connection with the meetings of the 10th convention of New York to be held at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 26-27, the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society have planned interesting programs. Board meetings of the two societies will be held Tuesday at 9:50 a. m. at the Baptist Temple. At 2 p. m. at the First Church, Miss Marguerita Moran and Miss Clara E. Norcott will give addresses, followed by a departmental conference at 4 p. m. Wednesday from 1:45-2:45 p. m. will be the woman's hour at the convention. Mrs. W. A. Montgomery and Miss Eleanor Blackmore will be the speakers. The woman's banquet will be held at the First church Wednesday at 7 p. m., tickets, seventy-five cents. Reservations for banquet should be made to Mrs. F. M. Viall, 61 Warwick ave., Rochester, all requests for reservations be accompanied by check or money order.

How inept it is to assert that the next revival will be ethical," says Rev. George H. Morrison. "As if the revival that is coming were to differ from revivals in the past. The implication is that past revivals moved largely in the realm of the emotions; they did not awaken, and awakening deepen, the sense of social responsibility, whereas in the next revival which God sends that social sense is going to be paramount, and the revival will be preeminently ethical. Preachers and brethren, I dispute that statement. It is based on a spacious ignorance of history. It confuses the moral problems of the day with the permanent elements of ethics. All great revivals have been intensely moral, and have fallen with a terrific impact on society, only it is the society of their own day, and not that of our present twentieth century. If in the revival that is coming we are awakened to the injustice of our social system, to the horror of slums, the evils of prostitution, the organization of nefarious traffics, that does not mean that our fathers were blind when the Spirit of God came down on them in power—it means that their moral problems were different. Every age has its own line of battle, every age, its peculiar moral problem."

A Statement on the Fielder Case

AT THE close of a year of theological study, Mr. Cecil G. Fielder appeared before us June 29.

It was then discovered that an ordination council had been called for the end of September. Wishing to know the judgment of the churches in this controverted case, the board reluctantly postponed consideration of it till fall. This council, which met Sept. 27, decided by a majority vote to ordain Mr. Fielder.

Oct. 4 Mr. Fielder again appeared before our board and told us that as a result of his study and reflection he had considerably changed the views expressed in the original paper prepared by him in Assam which formed the basis of the references of the investigating commission to his case and which were unsatisfactory to the board, as we have already published.

He assured us of his belief (1) in a personal, holy and loving God, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; (2) in the Trinity, agreeing to the New Testament teaching on that subject; (3) in preexistence, quoting with assurance the passage, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God, . . . and the Word became flesh and dwelt among us;" (4) in the deity of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit; (5) in the uniqueness and finality of Jesus as Saviour and Lord; (6) in the guilt and destructive power of sin and its penalty of spiritual death in separation from God; (7) in the atonement, in that the sufferings of Christ reveal the sufferings of God's heart over human sin, by which God is able to do for penitent sinners what he could not otherwise do for them, i. e., save them, so that these sufferings are their ransom and the price of their salvation; (8) in salvation by grace, in regeneration by the Holy Spirit, and eternal life as the gift of God; (9) in the miracles of Jesus and in his bodily resurrection; (10) in the scriptures which, he says, are the basis of his life, faith and hope, and in their trustworthiness as a guide for faith and practice; (11) in prayer, and the prayer of petition, and in prayer to the living Christ; (12) in Christian love as the all-conquering force in daily life and in subduing the world to Christ.

Hearing this confession of faith and being convinced of Mr. Fielder's sincerity, his exceptional devotion to Christ, and his sympathetic love for all his fellow men, we felt impelled by the Spirit to dismiss the theological charges against him, leaving the question of his future service to later consideration.

We issue this statement with Mr. Fielder's consent.

By order of the board of managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society.

—WILLIAM B. LIPPHARD, recording secretary—American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. Oct. 4, 1926.

It has been proposed that the visit of Queen Marie of Roumania to the United States may afford a favorable opportunity to remind her of the American principle of religious liberty and politely to call her attention to the persecution of Baptists in Roumania. Perhaps the thing will occur to her mind naturally from her ordinary contact with American life. So let us hope.

Competitive employes of the United States' government, while retaining the right to vote and to express privately their opinions on political subjects, are forbidden to take an active part in political management or in political campaigns. This also applies to temporary employes, employes on leave of absence with or without pay, substitutes, and laborers. Political activity in city, county, state, or national elections, whether primary or regular, or in behalf of any party or candidate, or any measure to be voted upon, is prohibited. The rule does not apply to presidential appointees, where it is most needed.

A reminder which may turn out to be as useful in America as in Britain is this one from the British Weekly: "Already we read, so far in a furtive and hesitating way, what later we shall probably hear without any squeamishness, that China, and the East generally, and indeed most people who are in our way, understand force and force only. We want to say that of China at least that is not true, and that as a matter of history it never was true. There is probably no people on earth which appreciates more intelligently the refusal of those who have power to put that power into operation."

The Federal Council of Churches carries an industrial creed which was widely published in connection with Labor day. Among the many interesting reactions to it is this from the Industrial Worker: "Stick to your pulpit, preacher. You are welcome to indulge in the illusions of hope for a better world in which the Christ spirit shall prevail. But as long as a class society exists with its antagonisms of class interest, the lion will never lie down with the lamb. And your soft blandishments will not solve that problem. Christian love will not solve it. Its solution, as Marx pointed out, 'summons as foes to the field of battle, the meanest, vilest, most malignant passions of the human breast—the furies of private interest.' And you, dear, kind gentlemen, are retained as advocates for the class that wants conditions maintained as they are. Your existence depends upon them and their property rights. . . . Stick to your pulpit, preacher, the stricken fields of the class struggle are not for you. The making of a classless world is the job of the oppressed. Out of their necessity and desperation, they will do it. The solution leads through a valley of tears and struggle. None dare face its terrors unless driven. And we who are driven will do it. Leave it to us, preachers, and stick to your pulpit. It's a more comfortable job."

Freaks of reason and flow of soul often go together. For instance, Rev. John D. Reid gives in the Crusaders' Champion five fundamental reasons why evolution should not be taught in the schools. After showing that evolution is "contrary to fact, reason and common sense," and that it "undermines all moral responsibility," he leaves for reflection this statement: "Later it may be shown to have a solid basis in verified and indisputable facts. When that has been done we shall most cordially wish it 'God-speed'."

Golden Rule dinners may become a fad, a ritual. From Geneva comes the story that 500 men and women from America and thirty other countries sat at table in the ballroom of the Hotel Les Bergues and ate rice, prunes, bread and cocoa from metal dishes, while they listened to a lecture about the orphans of the Near East. The dinners cost each about four cents. It was a great experience, doubtless, for them, because of its novelty. A less luxurious feast is familiar to many of us. But in any case, stand by the orphans.

It is reported that the radical Christian paper, the World Tomorrow, which for lack of support suspended publication, to resume publication under the editorship of Kirby Page and Devere Allen.

Religious education can be no more religious than the people who teach according to the Christian. It is not fool-proof system. There is no magic about it. We have not yet invented way of growing moral character without being moral.

A bulletin of the census bureau shows a total of 404,678 children in the United States in care of institutions or under the supervision of child-placing agencies Feb. 1, 1923. Of these, 204,888 were in institutions or receiving homes, 51,111 in free homes, 22,281 in boarding homes, 121,441 under supervision in their own homes, and 4904 were temporarily away from the institutions or foster homes but still under supervision.

Many nations will send delegates to a conference which has been invited by the United States government to meet in Hawaii, Apr. 11-16, 1927, for a mutual discussion of problems relating to education, reclamation and recreation. Invitations have been sent to all of the nations surrounding the Pacific, but the privilege of representation in the conference will be extended to all nations desiring to participate.

Over a year ago a movement was started in China for the careful preservation of a million copies of the New Testament to the people of that land. The plan was endorsed by the Bible societies and the missionaries who made request for 750,000 copies of the book for wide distribution among the people of the districts. A half-million of the books are now being printed in Shanghai and it is planned to begin the nationwide distribution this autumn.

Mr. Ed. Packard of Cambridge, Mass. has started a crusade of his own. This is what he means by it: "An entirely new era in church activities is on the way. Most of the clergy can't see it won't admit it. It involves abandonment of close corporation and creedal straddles, and of publicity methods to which the rank and file of humanity are attracted. These are strained, formal, embarrassing, and to a large extent hypocritical. The general public will not be encumbered or tagged by them. Credit and old-fashioned church methods are the way to the junk pile. The Lord released knowledge about hitherto unknown laws, now operating through cinema, the radio, and other epochal coveries yet to come, which so massively disseminate information, in order that the gospel may have a chance in the world in spite of a provincialized church and commercialized press; and the church must use these methods to really spread the gospel throughout the earth, or itself be defeated through universal employment of these powerful publicity mediums by decadent and exploiting forces—a situation which actually confronts the churches today."

Compromise Programs Are Futile

OPPONENTS of prohibition continue to urge some compromise by which the provisions of the Volstead act may be relaxed. Proposals range all the way from a referendum to an investigation. The latest proposal is that of Mayor Dever of Chicago. He would create a special commission of inquiry composed of selected members of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, the American Bar Association, the American Medical Association and perhaps other equally disinterested national organizations, to make a full investigation of the liquor problem and to publish the results. He thinks that the obvious fairness of the method would go far toward dissipating a factual spirit and toward supplying the facts required for an intelligent approach to the problem.

That sounds fair. It is meant to be fair. Considered as a method, it is fair. But it is also futile. It would be a sheer waste of time, effort and money. It does not touch the heart of the problem. What would such a commission achieve? It would add little to the available information on the subject. Research on the subject of alcohol in its physiological, moral, economic and political aspects has been long and thorough. The facts are known. An investigation would not clarify, and might befog, the issue.

What is the issue? It is not liberty. Supporters of the Volstead law are as fully devoted to the cause of human freedom as its opponents are. It is not state rights. State regulation of the liquor business was tried until the business entrenched itself in the federal government and ruthlessly overrode state laws. The states resorted to the amendment to the federal constitution in self-defense. The issue is not whether education or legislation is the proper method of procedure. Both are necessary and both are in

There is only one issue and it is clear: Shall the federal constitution be nullified to serve the appetite and avarice of a lawless minority? All arguments, all investigations and all proposals for compromise reduce themselves to that one question. Settle that and you settle all.

It remains to be shown that the Volstead law hurts anybody who intends in good faith to comply with the eighteenth amendment. Mayor Dever himself has analyzed the situation exactly in the following words: "During the first year or two after the passage of the Volstead act the effect was generally beneficial. Following this period, however, came the organizations of bootleggers, beer runners and official corruptionists. Within the last two or three years a new disturbing development has followed the organization of this syndicated commercialized traffic, that is, the widespread making of beer and hard liquor in private homes." No investigation by a commission could add anything to his official information except perhaps to show how widespread is the domestic manufacture of liquor, and no commission can find that out.

The situation as he officially discerns it is one of a wholesale violation of the law by a vast organization of "bootleggers, beer runners and official corruptionists," and he might have added that such a condition is systematically condoned and encouraged by a group of influential daily papers. Under state prohibition, for which the mayor has warm praise, every state had to deal with a similar organization of lawlessness and official corruption, and the center of those evils was then right where it is now, in the wet states and the large cities. Experience has shown that the alternative to national prohibition is no prohibition. And the organized attack on the Volstead law has just one object in view, namely, to overthrow prohibition and turn the booze gang loose upon the streets once more. No modification short of that result will be accepted by the gang.

Suppose that the whole business should be investigated again, card indexed, tabulated and graphed; would appetite and avarice be less urgent than at present? Would the organization of lawless booze and corrupt politics be dissolved? Would the issue between law and lawlessness be less keen? Such a hope is vain.

Especially offensive to the mayor and to many others like him who have a sincere regard for civil liberty is the domestic search and seizure provision of the Volstead law. It is no less offensive to prohibitionists. They have no love for needless legal invasions of the home. But the home has some obligations to the community that it may not ignore. The law does not hesitate to follow small-pox or typhoid fever or truancy into the home, and the home that makes itself a producing and disseminating center of intoxicating drink, that sends drunken members out upon the streets, or pours alcoholic poison down the throats of its children, invites the legal scrutiny of the public.

There has never been a time when the friends of temperance were not ready to consider in a friendly spirit any constructive proposals for a rational solution of the problem of alcoholism as related to the general welfare. They know that the consideration of other important public questions is being delayed by this conflict. They know that the struggle has cost them toil, obloquy, millions of dollars, and sometimes assassination. But having fought for more than half a century against the same lawless business supported by the same unscrupulous federation of vice and corruption, and having at last forced it into a position where it is revealing itself to all the world as willing to overthrow the nation itself rather than forego its own vice and rapacity, how can they yield upon such an issue?

There is just one mandate to which the prohibitionist is willing to yield; it is the mandate of an honest and lawful election. The present law represents such a mandate. Where there is law so enacted, under a constitution that provides adequate protection for the rights of minorities, let the lawbreaker, not the law, yield. Let every man take his stand on one side or the other of this issue.

Coeducation and the College Critic

THE Lord Bishop of London on his trip around the world has been visiting the United States. Recently he visited some of the colleges of the middle west and the newspapers have reported his impressions of coeducation. "Only high moral purpose on the part of the students in coeducational institutions can make coeducation safe," is the way the Lord Bishop sums up his conclusions. This, of course, is mild and almost trite when compared with the sensational indictment brought against a certain university, not named, by a recent graduate who alleges that drink and all its immoral accompaniments characterize the conduct of many of the students. The inference of the indictment is that this one university is only a sample of all institutions of learning where sexes are unsegregated. These blanket charges brought against our great universities have not gone unchallenged. Vigorous protest against what they regard as a libel, and an insistent demand for particular and definite proof have been registered by both the faculties and students of the universities. But aside from general statements made in an article written by a Mr. Cross and published in a church paper no bill of particulars has been presented.

It is doubtless true that freedom rather than restraint marks the conduct of students today in all schools from the high school to the university. There is no disguising the fact that many of the old conventions have been discarded by the young people of the present age. The sheltered woman of past generations is unknown in a day when women take their place alongside men in education, industry, commerce and politics. Coeducation is inevitable in a civilization which compels women to compete with men in life's struggle for existence and to cooperate with men in the work of the world. This comparatively recent development of the status of women in society has precipitated conditions which our existing customs are not fitted to control. New customs have to be created to meet new conditions. In the period that elapses between the departure from the old and the acceptance of the new confusion arises and the mores, from which we get our word, morals, are obscured. That is largely the situation in society at the present time. Colleges are only a part of all human life. The conditions which exist in our universities exist all the way down through the strata of society. The college is no better and no worse than the rest of the social fabric. If it is singled out for special criticism it is only because higher education is a special privilege enjoyed by less than 1 per cent of the people of America.

Coeducation in itself is not the cause of any looseness that exists in our colleges. History, both past and present, proves that the segregation of the sexes in the process of higher education does not prevent excesses. In fact segregation is fraught with perils to which coeducation is a stranger. Sir Philip Gibbs in his novel, "The Heir Apparent," has shown conclusively that in England where segregation is the custom the same conditions exist that are found among the young people of all lands today. The cause of the conditions described by W. O. Cross in the article already referred to, so far as they exist, goes deeper than the fact that hundreds of young men and young women are found on the same campus. If we dig deep enough shall we not find the real cause in the fact that transfer is being made between the conventional of yesterday and the conventional of today? "Lost in transfer, a common phrase used by freight carriers, might well be applied to many of our young people who have started to make the crossing from the old to the new and have lost their way. The landmarks of the past are indistinct and the guideposts of the ideals which they dimly cherish are obscured. They roam about in "No Man's Land," the unfortunate victims of missiles thrown from both sides. No serious purpose steadies them, no fixed rule holds them, no past tradition guides them. The hazardous, the thrilling, the precarious, are the things which appeal.

Can we hope for steadiness among young men and women when the social and spiritual equilibrium is so disturbed? Is there not point and pith in the criticism of youth that they are what their elders have made them? Is it time for both old and young to repent and to return not to the outworn formulas and conventions of a past generation, but to the eternal and spiritual principles of character and conduct embodied in Jesus Christ and not subject to the accidents and circumstances of the changing years.

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

When Europe Owes Uncle Sam Fifty Billion Dollars

Investments on the part of capitalists of the United States keep climbing at the rate of a billion a year. Mr. John Foster Dulles, one of the economic advisers at the peace conference, thinks that such investments may climb to fifty billion dollars. These investments will be planted not only in Europe but in many other parts of the world. The main burden will fall upon Europe. Will the effects be good or ill? Possibly both. There will be discontent wherever the burden falls. There may be bitterness and conflict. But the end will be beneficial. Capital is creating an economic organization for the world. It is becoming international and already it is dominating and subordinating nationalism. In the end it will compel government to become international in sheer self-defense.

Whether by Resolutions or Otherwise Get Peace

The Christian Leader has this to say, "Getting peace by passing resolutions seems to be one of the fond dreams of our day. Conventions and organizations are besought to resolve that there will be no more war. Nothing is gained by ignoring facts, and the most serious criticism made of the advanced pacifists today is that they ignore the facts of history and human nature. As a race, we are still far away from these ideals, and what we have gained is the result of long years of struggle against the elements of human nature that must be moulded and reined." Very well. The same thing is true of all progress of government. Resolutions have their place with all of the other practical efforts to promote progress. Having solved for peace we shall proceed by the most practical method to carry those resolutions into effect. Welcome the resolutions.

When Corporations are Owned in Common

Mr. Walter Runciman estimates that there are nearly sixteen million capitalists in England. Most of these are people who have only a few shares. The number of workmen in America who own shares in corporations is estimated at twenty million. The objection has been made to employees' ownership that possession of small shares of stock gives them no effective control over the business of the corporation. But Mr. Mitten, head of the Philadelphia transit system, favors further employee ownership. He has organized the employees of his system with a view to investing their savings in the stocks of railways and with the expressed intention of building up a control of the capital of the railways by the employees. They already own 50 per cent of the stock. If this result comes to pass we shall by and by have popular ownership and democratic control of a great corporation.

Questionnaire Test of Religion in Great Britain

The Nation and Athenaeum, a London magazine, sent out a questionnaire among its readers to ascertain the attitude toward certain doctrines of Christianity. Results may surprise the readers. Of about 13,000 persons replying, nearly 10,000 said that they do not believe in a personal God, and nearly the same number gave a similar reply as to the divinity of Christ, personal immortality, or any form of Christianity. Only eighty-eight replies accepted the story of creation as true history. The same questionnaire was put out by the London Daily News, and among its readers the ratio of answers on the several points was almost exactly reversed on all of the above questions except Genesis. Of the News replies six to one were against the historical truth of the creation story. What does the questionnaire show? Possibly it shows merely that people are more ready to publish their religious opinions than they used to be. Possibly it may give a hint of the nature and dimensions of the task of evangelizing Great Britain.

Too Much Politics in the Netherlands And Too Little in America

Harry E. Woolever, writing from Holland, says, "Politics is the bane of the Netherlands, as it is in many other countries." He says that in that country, having a population only slightly larger than Ohio, selfishness and partisanship hamper the country. But in America we urge people to vote in order to save the country. It would seem therefore that when the people are not interested in politics and when they are interested in politics, the country, alike, is going to the dogs. The conclusion is superficial in either case. What the nation needs at the polls is an assemblage of intelligent community spirit.

Mammonia Plays at Anything That Pays

Your puritan reformer is an interesting animal. With the best intention in the world, with a sort of agony of conscience, he strives to clean up this or that. Now it is football; again, prize fighting, or movies, or politics, or news stands, or sabbath breaking, or the injurious use of narcotics. At every turn of his efforts at reform he bumps against the solid and manifest fact that the evils he assails are entrenched behind selfish profit-seeking investments. Greedy commercialization is the notorious source of the corruption. Mammonia guards the gates against him, pockets the profits, and laughs in his face. He knows the fact but its significance for his program of reform never dawns upon him. He refuses to study the relation between sordid private gain and the public good. He mops up the water while leaving the faucet turned on.

What Has Religion to Do With Politics and Business?

Occasionally, even yet, complaint is heard that preachers, church papers, and religious assemblies are turning aside from the gospel to deal with secular affairs. What all of those religious agencies so criticized are actually doing is talking about what Christianity means in the several social relations. Whether their proposals are wise or unwise is a matter for legitimate discussion. But it is interesting to observe that in all of the leading denominations and in nearly all parts of the world they are giving essentially the same social interpretation of Christianity. That interpretation is of course embarrassing in the realms of both business and politics, because actual practice in those realms never has risen morally to the Christian level. But in those realms arise some of the most vital questions of life and duty. Shall we consent to the principle that in industry, trade, government, citizenship, and community welfare the principles of Christian morality have no place? If not, how can any agency through which the gospel finds expression excuse itself from turning upon these areas of human conduct the light of Christian morals?

Are Miracles a Thing of the Past?

When we, in His name, again do "mighty works," controversy about miracles will cease.

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

IT IS significant that the word, "miracle," disappears entirely from the revised version, being replaced by three other words which more accurately represent the meaning of the original. These words are "signs," "mighty powers," and "works." They are important words and it is essential that we use them and master their meaning. The word, "miracle," has other than Christian associations. It has been, often enough, part of the vocabulary of magic, and magic is the last idea we should associate with the life and works of our Lord. The three words in the revised version lift us clear out of this atmosphere and take us into a moral realm to which properly our Lord's mighty works belong.

We must insist upon the fact that the record of these mighty works is not a legendary addendum to the Gospels slipped in surreptitiously, or superstitiously, at a later time by men who desired to represent Christ as a wonder worker. This theory is popular among certain scholars who, however, have never advanced a convincing reason for holding it. There is nothing whatever in the historical or literary method of reading the New Testament which can fairly be pressed into the service of this theory. On the contrary, there is the striking fact that the earliest Gospel—Mark—contains most of what is called "miracle" and the latest Gospel—John—contains least, that is, in quantity. The emphasis of this latest Gospel is on the spiritual aspect of Christ's work and teaching. This is contrary to the method of legend which tends to multiply wonders as time removes the living scenes from the record of them.

Miracles of Christ Are Part of Christ

The miracles of Christ are not detachable from Christ himself and regarded as something apart without relation to their worker. They are part of Christ, part of his teaching, part of his gospel. They are wholly consistent with what he was and what he taught. The person and the works stand or fall together. This was his own claim on their behalf and it must stand unchallenged. The miracles are related to him as colors are related to the white beam of light: they are included in the beam. The colors are the light unravelled.

The record of the miracles in the Gospels is selective. In order to appreciate this it is only necessary to study the so-called "apocryphal miracles" and observe the immense difference between the two. The "Gospel of the Infancy," for example, is full of impossible marvels. It represents Jesus when a boy playing with his companions and making birds out of clay. The birds made by the others fell to pieces; those made by Jesus flew away. The Gospels contain no such ridiculous tales.

The severe economy of the miracles is remarkable. When all are counted up, their number is astonishingly small. It is clear that our Lord never wrought a mighty work for the mere sake of doing it: never to astonish a gaping crowd, never to enrich himself, never to hurt a foe, never to confound an opponent. On the contrary, he often refused to perform a great work. And upon some of his patients he imposed a severe silence: "Tell it to no man." There is a meaning in this studied reserve, a meaning which modern rationalism has not tried to understand, if, indeed, it has noticed it.

All the miracles have a doctrinal and spiritual setting. Not once did one of the mighty works begin and end with itself. Jesus connected each with the moral and spiritual state of men and the message of his kingdom. When, therefore, Matthew Arnold asked, "What evidence of authority would it be for a man to turn a pen into a pen-wiper before our eyes?" he set a question which was as inept and unrelated to anything our Lord ever did as anything could well be.

The essential and underlying thing in the consideration of our Lord's miracles is that Christ himself was the real miracle: a miracle of purity, love, humanity and holiness. He is utterly unexplained by the Jewish race to which naturally he belonged, and by the time in which he appeared. It is this great "fact of Christ" as Dr. Carnegie Simpson phrases it, which confronts us as the outstanding thing and to which primary attention must be directed.

Our Lord's program is set forth in three key verses. First: It is recorded that when he emerged from the ordeal of the great temptation and entered upon his public ministry, "He returned in the power of the Spirit" (Luke 4:14). What he did from that time onward was a manifestation of Spirit "power." It was a "dynamic" force which worked upon and through him. What he mediated was a "power" superior to that of which men had knowledge.

Second: When he commenced his ministry at Nazareth "where he was brought up" he set forth his program as that of a repairer of human damage: "a gospel to the poor, release to the captives, sight to the blind, liberty to the bruised, a jubilee year for all" (Luke 4:18).

Third: At one of the critical moments of his life when the purpose of his mission was brought into sharp relief through the hostility of the Pharisees whom he described as hirelings and plunderers of the human flock, he announced his own work in one comprehensive sentence: "I am come that they might have life and have it in abundance" (John 10:10). In other words, he came to fulfil completely human destiny.

That was the program. The performance must match it and harmonize with it. In this light let us examine the miracles of Christ. Do they harmonize with that program?

The "Finger of God"

The miracles fall into three main groups: Power over nature; power over death; power over disease. These varied cures and nature masteries definitely expressed his purpose as the Saviour of man. Not one was wrought to display, or to create astonishment; all were wrought to help and relieve the needy. They all fitted in perfect with his declared program. They were exhibitions of spiritual force of which he held the secret. Quite definitely he refers them to the "finger of God" (Luke 11:20). They were expressions also of a generous and divine love. He walked upon the lake not to display his power, but to bring comfort to his distracted disciples. He multiplied the loaves and fishes to relieve a pressing hunger: "I was moved with compassion." He turned the water into wine to save from embarrassment a newly married peasant pair whose joy would have been spoiled had they known that at such a time their supplies had run out. He healed all manner of diseases to relieve from the bondage of the flesh men and women who suffered a severe handicap. In all these things he was taking the way that lead to the fulfilment of human destiny. Every miracle was meant to enable men to have "life in abundance."

It is not possible to deny the fact of the miracles, so as the result of pure prejudice or a cavalier treatment of history. They belong as we have seen to the earliest tradition and were not introduced at a much later period as an accretion. The apostles continually appealed to them and that in the very places where the mighty works were wrought. Peter could say on the day of Pentecost, "He did mighty works and wonders and signs in the midst of you, as you yourselves know" (Acts 2:23). The mighty works were never denied by our Lord's enemies. The apostles who record our Lord's miracles also record their own, but they were always careful to say that "in his name" they were wrought (Acts 3:12 etc.). It is worth nothing that they record no "nature" miracles as having been performed by them. There is a meaning in this. Had they wished to idealize him they would never have represented themselves as in any way sharing his power. In any case, had they woven around his memory a garland of fantastic legend they would have used colors far more vivid than they did. We must admit that if they were inventors, they were sorry bunglers at the job. Their very sobriety of statement is an eloquent witness to their truthfulness

The explanation of the facts is quite another matter and here we may easily get beyond our depth. It is better to avoid speculation and keep to the facts as they are recorded. We see, for example, that our Lord used different means to accomplish his one general end. Sometimes he cured by direct contact as when he touched the leper or the blind. Sometimes the cure was wrought in a moment; at other times it was protracted. One blind man was restored at a word; another was sent to the pool of Siloam to wash; another was touched repeatedly before sight returned. Some were healed by suggestion; some on the spot and others at a distance. From some Christ demanded faith as a condition of healing; of others he made no such demand. And once at least he was baffled: He could do there no mighty work because of their unbelief" (Mark 5). Putting together all the cases of healing, it seems clear that our Lord used mental and psychic methods; that, for the most part, these were conditioned by the mental or moral response made by the patients. They present no difficulty whatever to the enlightened modern mind which sees in these workings an action not contrary to, but within, law. They are not less divine on that account.

The Nature Miracles

The nature miracles are not so easy to comprehend. It is true they have no analogy in our experience, but that is not a valid reason for denying that one to whom nature was as an open book exercised a mastery over certain elements which even to us are now beginning to yield their deeper secrets. Allow that in the reporting there is a certain poetic license, and that the description a modern would give of these events might differ considerably from the description given by an unscientific observer. Allow also, if you choose, that spiritual truths may have been clad in poetic and parabolic forms in order the more easily to gain the oriental mind. Even then the fundamental question remains untouched. The point is, could one who came to bring man into his full inheritance as a child of God have had no light to throw upon those baffling forces which seem to leave him at the mercy of physical law and so doing raise questions within him as to the reality of that Fatherhood which is the very soul of Christian teaching? Given Christ, the question of the probability of nature miracles is quite a natural one. Do we know enough to enable us to say dogmatically that the "power of the spirit" has no authority in the physical realm? Do we understand so perfectly the mystery of the Spirit's retirement from the body in death as to be able to affirm that not even in exceptional circumstances can the union between the two be reaffected? To ask these questions is not to solve the mystery, but it should put us on guard against making our ignorance the measure of all things—us, especially, to whom a fuller revelation of nature's secret forces is being increasingly granted.

The practical question is, what is the relation of these mighty works to ourselves in any way that brings them within the circle of great things by which we live?

To begin with, we do not expect nature miracles. We expect the storm to blow out. Water cannot support the weight of our bodies. To obtain bread we must respect the ordinary course of nature. When our dead leave us they leave the world forever. All this we take for granted. But suppose after all, Christ should be showing us that we need not be victims of the natural order and that the sons of God may yet obtain a mastery over nature which will enable them to do their higher work for God without an unnecessary handicap. It is worth while to pause and think this out, especially in the light of modern discoveries.

"Greater Works"

We come nearer home when we ask whether the miracles of healing belong alone to the past. What did our Lord mean when he said to the disciples, "The works that I do shall ye do also and greater works than these shall ye do because I go to the Father"? (John 14:12) If we accept the testimony of the Acts of the Apostles we must admit that similar mighty works were done in Christ's name in the early days of the church. Further, St. Paul speaks of the "gift of healing" as one of the evidences of the Spirit's operation. Shall we say, with so many, that these were special gifts belonging exclusively to the early days of Christianity and that they were withdrawn by God in favor of an exact doctrine and a clean-cut theology? By what right do we say this? Is it not rather that the church has dropped out of her program something that our Lord meant to be a permanent part of his gospel? All heresies and bizarre religions thrive upon some practice of Christian truth which the church has sacrificed or the importance of which it has lessened. Certain it is that a growing belief exists in the supremacy of spiritual forces over the disintegrating forces of disease and that these higher forces are available for us if we will only fit ourselves to employ them. We need not incline to the extreme either of decrying all spiritual forces and reposing our trust in science, surgery and medicine alone, or of decrying science in favor of a ridiculous philosophy which denies facts which any good microscope can immediately demonstrate. The truth lies in a middle way. Science is of God, and spiritual forces are of God. Medicine and surgery are both necessary in the work of healing, but spiritual force may become the dynamic of both and at times supersede both. There is an intimate relation between flesh and spirit. Our Lord connected health and right relationship with God and these two things must never be severed. Men who seek health for its own sake and without reference to the stewardship of life are selfish people. On the other hand, it should be understood that no medical practitioner is fully qualified for his work unless he be a spiritual man and is prepared also to use spiritual methods. The program of Christ remains unchanged. It is time for the church of God to cease haggling about miracles and to fit itself to be the medium of our Lord's full redemptive work for body, soul and spirit. When we in his name, are again able to do "mighty works" the controversy about miracles will cease. A present demonstration will compel men to believe in the truth of the Gospel records. We have lived in the lowlands too long. Let us ascend to the heights.

ENTRANCE TO ADMINISTRATION HALL, OTTAWA UNIVERSITY

"Plain but Guid"

BY H. CAMPBELL-DUNCAN

NOT long ago I interviewed a monstrously rich man. He told his dollars by millions, his factory areas by acres, his railway spurs by miles. He was self-made. He had pushed his way to the top by sheer, innate organizing and driving ability. He had just sent a five-figure check to a university and was rather patronizing about it. The money meant nothing to him. He looked upon it as charity. He regarded universities and their graduates with a certain condescension. He had got along all right without ever seeing the inside of one. Why not others? Besides, he felt that any enterprise incapable of carrying itself and showing a dollars-and-cents profit was an economic anomaly. That was his strongly expressed opinion. He stood by it.

Yet I could have pointed out to this man had it been my business at the time to take issue with him, that every dollar of his vast fortune could be traced straight back to the classroom and the laboratory. What I mean is, that while knowledge is the most intangible, it is also the most powerful force in the development of civilization. Without knowledge we should still be the half-dumb, savage nomads of prehistoric periods, or worse. There is nothing good, nothing beautiful, nothing useful in the world that is not the direct product of knowledge, and consequently of the places wherein knowledge is dispensed.

And, speaking in terms of industry, I might have added that knowledge, both as the raw material of the research laboratory and the finished product of the classroom, is a tremendously costly thing to obtain and market, and that if our universities attempted to operate upon an industrial basis—sell knowledge at a cash profit, or even at a price which would meet expenses, to say nothing of providing for future development—none but the rich would be able to buy it and many of the nation's finest intellects would be barred from the market.

That is the reason Ottawa university, Ottawa, Kansas, is campaigning for $750,000, asking it not as charity, but offering in exchange an investment paying assured dividends in those benefits which are the direct products of knowledge.

Shuffling my impressions of Ottawa university following a recent visit I was reminded of the old Scotsman's description of the fare in a wayside inn:

"Ye'll ken it's plain but guid."

That is how the institution struck me—plain but good. Not too plain, but plain as the simplicity of beauty may be plain, and good in the sense of thoroughness, soundness and honesty of purpose. This idea I found strongly emphasized in both buildings and equipment. There are no frills or flub-dubs. And this applies to the campus as well. I failed to spot a single paint-spattered "Leaping Lena" or any other grotesqueries dear to the heart of the average student. The whole personnel of the university seemed to be there for work rather than with any idea of decoration, although the charm of the coeds was beyond question.

I shall not dissipate the little space at my disposal by rhapsodizing over the physical side of Ottawa: its thirty-three acres of campus shaded by magnificent trees, the quaint charm of Taub Jones hall or the perfect equipment of the science building. The cold physical facts may be found in the official bulletin—"mailed upon request". It is rather the spirit of Ottawa that interests me and, I hope, you too, for if the spirit is right all else will be well.

Ottawa is a Baptist institution and as such clings close to the Christian ideals upon which the denomination is founded. Its aim is to turn out cultured men and women highly sensitized to their religious and social responsibilities. Ottawa not only trains ministers, missionaries, teachers for secular schools and those wishing to follow similar callings, but also prospective physicians, lawyers, financiers, business executives, musicians and other professional workers.

It is more than sixty years since Ottawa was founded. Relatively, that was a long time ago when one rememers that the West was then only beginning to emerge from the grip of its bloody Indian wars. And, oddly enough, an Indian was its founder. Rev. John Tecumseh Jones, an Ottawa and a Baptist missionary to his own people, proposed in 1860 that the Baptist whites and the Indians should combine in creating a school, as the Indians had the land while the whites had the teachers. Thus (shorn of the organization details) Ottawa university came into being.

ERDMANN SMITH

Management by a mixed board, however, did not prove satisfactory and in 1873 the whites took complete control, receiving 1280 acres of the original 20,000-acre endowment, of which one-half was later sold to defray the cost of the settlement. Of the period that followed the university historian says: "The progress of Ottawa university after the settlement with the Indians forms a pleasing record. Although there have been dark days, bright days have been much more numerous, and, on the whole, prosperity has attended the institution."

The noble men who had hope and faith in the dark days and worked hard and managed safely in the bright days wrote their names in letters of gold into the history of Ottawa university. They will be associated forever with the growth and the glory of the institution. The recent president, Silas Eber Price, D.D., gave of himself whole-heartedly to the cause and the college he loved and loves now. He sacrificed, served, and pointed the way in Ottawa's affairs over a period of eighteen years. He was untiring in his work, a lover of youth, a conservative executive, and a great Christian. The present plant and equipment, says his successor, are largely the fruit of his labor. Doctor Price is now president emeritus and lives in Pasadena, Calif.

Found Pres. Erdmann Smith, A.M., LL.D., in his place. These young university presidents have offices nowadays, not studies, for it is an age when executive ability must equal scholastic attainments in the direction of an educational institution. Certain it is that President Smith has both. His executive ability, I fancy, came to him by virtue of his English, Scottish ancestry. He was born in Essex county, Ontario, Canada, and this I know, when you find a black-haired, brown-eyed English Scot from Essex county, you have a man who knows exactly how many cents there are in a dollar and how to make them do their best work. I say I know. I do. I'm from Ontario myself.

Erdmann Smith is a practical idealist, and proud as only an English Scot can be of the institution of which he is the head. He is proud of his faculty; proud that the institution is highly rated; proud of his plant, the fine buildings and equipment; proud of the class of students that Ottawa attracts; proud of the part both they and the faculty play in the life of the city; proud of the graduates, many of whom occupy places of importance in the business, professional and cultural world; but prouder still of the long list of men and women who have given their lives to carrying the gospel of Christ into the far corners of the earth.

Grasping the present and looking into the future President Smith has set himself a full-sized man's job. First, he wants to see Ottawa with a clean balance sheet. It irks his soul to feel that the university is unable at present to operate without adding to its already heavy deficit, a deficit that has been unavoidable in the line of duty, because, as I have pointed out, the gathering and distribution of knowledge is a costly matter. The present cramped quarters of Ottawa's fine library is another daily thorn in his side. The books are there, about 15,000 of them, but where to find additional shelf room is a question. Then, again, every time he crosses the campus he is confronted with the foundations of the projected commons building, unfinished for lack of funds. Here he hopes to center much of the social life of the students and faculty and, perhaps, house the library until it can be moved to a separate home of its own.

Erdmann Smith is a specialist in college administration in which study he did graduate work at the University of Chicago. He has organized a faculty club which meets monthly to discuss institutional problems and to plan for the general improvement of the university.

This, perhaps, accounts in large measure for the atmosphere of unity, of cooperation and cohesion that prevails. There is a downrightness, a forcefulness, about the president that seems to permeate the whole place—no pretence, no sham, no, as the British say, "swank". And there is a homey atmosphere, withal. True, only about thirty coeds live upon the campus (dormitories for both sexes are still in the future) but Ottawa is a city of homes, good homes, trim, snug, airy places to live in with fine trees and lawns and "honest-to-goodness" back yards, and in these homes the students find lodging at reasonable rates. These are among the things that made me think of the phrase—"plain but guid".

Ottawa university is a busy place all the year round. Indeed, there is scant time for the necessary annual overhauling. The regular session lasts nine months, until June 1. Then comes the summer session from June to August and in the intervening period the plant is used for the Kansas Baptist Assembly lasting two weeks, with about 1000 delegates, then the Franklin County Teachers' Institute for another two weeks with about 100 in attendance. During these affairs the campus is dotted with tents to accommodate the visitors.

Two things are taboo at Ottawa: secret societies and the use of tobacco in any form within the university precincts. Fraternities and sororities are banned by official order, but the ban on tobacco was made by the students and is enforced by them. Not that there are no students who smoke. Some do, but not on the campus at peril of the more tender portions of their anatomy. The violator of this unwritten rule is made to run the gauntlet of the whole student body lined up between the entrance gates and the main building, a painful performance, since each of the administrators of justice wields a healthy-sized paddle and the distance must be between eighty and 100 yards.

In place of the secret societies with their Greek-letter insignia are athletic and cultural bodies, literary societies, musical organizations, a fine dramatic club and the like.

In athletics Ottawa concentrates upon the general physical fitness of the individual rather than upon intercollegiate championships and the collecting of cups, although its record in the latter field is one of which to be proud. The big gymnasium is fully equipped to meet the needs of a wide variety of games and there is a splendid sports field with a quarter-mile cinder track. Each student is required to take three years of physical training under the direction of three athletic coaches, one of whom is a woman.

As I write these closing words of my story I have a mental picture of Erdmann Smith, keen of eye, strong of jaw, sitting at his desk by that campus window, planning for the future, seeing Ottawa university with an endowment sufficient to insure a clean balance sheet at the end of each year, and preparing his campaign for the three-quarters of a million put the college where it ought to be. And I feel convinced that he will get it. Why? Well, perhaps because Ottawa is, as I have said—"plain but guid."

Rock of Ages

Its literary and theological value

By ETHEL BURGESS LOWRY

WHAT gives a composition value? Study any great literary production, and you will find woven into the fabric of it life's two great realities, truth and beauty. When these are translated into terms of humanity there results that vitalizing force called love. As in life, so in literature, truth and beauty give power, charm, and permanence.

Truth is the pearl of great price for which the scientist sells all; beauty is the end and aim of an artist's existence. The literary man must be master in the realms of truth and beauty, a scientist and an artist, a discerner of truth and a creator of beauty. He must work with material even as the mason or carpenter. He must deal with personalities, facts, ideas, and principles. In making his selection, he is guided by the principle of avoiding the strange, the mysterious, the unproved, selecting things that are vital to the needs of humanity, personalities that do harm, facts founded upon truth, ideas that allure, and principles that are dependable. The nice intuition of the scientific artist leads him to select the material nearest the heart of humanity. As the shell forever sings of the distant sea, this material will echo and reecho the needs, joys, failures and aspirations of humanity.

But the literary artist is too much of a scientist to accept any of his material at its face value. The fact must be analyzed and made to yield its nucleus of truth. The idea must be given manifold settings and in each must allure the imagination. His personalities for a time must be his companions. Finally, the principles must be tested in his every-day life with his fellows. Having all this, the sequence is knowledge, not truth. The literary man must find truth; for truth with its twin sister, beauty, is the essence of literature. It will be only when he has established the proper relationship between the facts, personalities, ideas, and principles, and has applied this relationship to the needs, hopes and aspirations of humanity, that truth is discernible.

The literary artist must see that his compositions are endowed with a beauty that appeals to the heart. In so doing, he gives his composition individuality. This individuality is often the unconscious outpouring of the personality of the writer. As the artist fashions the frame, he will remember that the beauty of literature must appeal to the imagination by being suggestive rather than definite. Like the sea, the beauty of literature must be always the same, yet ever different. Again, the artist will see that the beauty he is creating appeals to the intellect by being thought-provoking. Finally he will enrich the framework by giving it a beauty that lures the soul of a man to a grander endeavor as he contemplates it in his more spiritual moments.

The twofold task accomplished, truth is adorned with beauty; the essay, epic, or poem is finished. Then it is given to the appreciative reader. To what end? That it may instruct and charm? Rather, that it may prove a doorway through which his heart and mind may pass into realms of joy, love, serenity and ecstasy. If the reader's eyes are not blinded by worldly cares and his reason warped by false values, the selection will be to him a sign post, guiding him to God; for a true literary man is a prophet of God, a preacher of truth and beauty.

Such was the poet Toplady. He was a discerner of truth and a creator of beauty. The material from which he wrought the poem, "Rock of Ages," was fundamental and vital. The poem deals with such material things as rock, tears, water, and blood, with which all are familiar. The tremendous fact presented is sin, and man's need of salvation. The ideas are simple enough to be profound. They deal with the power of sin, with man's consciousness of sin, his insufficiency, his need of a Saviour, and of the fleeting nature of human life. The personality radiating the entire poem is the loving, compassionate Saviour. The principle set forth is that of vicariousness. Much of this material has been used by seers in all ages. David, Isaiah, Paul, Dante and Milton used it in the creation of poems of marvelous beauty.

That the poet Toplady tested this material in the laboratory of his own life no one who has read the poem doubts. So closely does this experience underlie the poem that we can almost share with him his joy in discovering the truth, that the suffering of the tender, compassionate Saviour atoned for sin for all time, and for all mankind. Toplady not only tested this truth for himself, but watched as it was tested in the lives of others. The result was always the same, the loving heart of God is the nucleus of life. God's love and the fact of salvation are the jewels of truth he has to present. Skillfully, in simple, suggestive, symbolic language, did he fashion a frame for these stupendous truths.

He begins, "Rock of Ages." In three words he introduces the original element of earth and the fundamental fact of history, age. Ideas of permanence and strength are established only to be swept away by the next phrase, "clef for me." This phrase is suggestive, thought-provoking. Why for me? Of what value to me was the sacrifice? The answer is suggested in the next line, "Let me hide myself in thee." In the word "hide" lie hidden ideas of sin, consciousness of guilt, and man's need of a shelter from the destroying angel, death. With the mention of water, blood, and riven side, personality is introduced and we realize that the language is symbolic. The Rock of Ages is the suffering Christ. Building on this fact comes humanity's cry for healing and sustaining power.

*"Not the labors of my hands
Can fulfil thy law's demands;
Could my zeal no respite know,
Could my tears forever flow,
All for sin could not atone;
Thou must save and thou alone."*

This stanza suggests that all the experiments tried in the laboratory of the poet's life did not yield truth. Time, labor, and tears have been wasted trying to discover the jewel, salvation. This stanza is a confession of those experiences, of inefficiency and of utter reliance on God.

The third stanza suggests another unprofitable experience. The poet has sought to purchase salvation, only to discover when poor, helpless, foul, and naked, that salvation is the gift of God.

The miracle of salvation was accomplished in the life of the poet and lives in the spirit of the last stanza. Here are serenity and joy in the face of a fleeting existence and a certain death. Man in imagination is already testing the joy of eternal life in the heart of God.

In twenty exquisite lines, the poet tells the story of man's travail in sin, his yearning, his salvation, and his ecstasy. Gilding the entire poem with beauty is the personality of God. "Rock of Ages" is a poem that has made a universal appeal. It has proved a doorway through which sin-burdened, earth-bound souls may pass into the realization of life everlasting in the heart of God.

The Devotional Life

The Creator and Sustainer of the Universe

Psalm 104

FROM "THE PSALMS", TRANSLATED BY J. M. POWIS SMITH*

LET my whole being bless the Lord!
O Lord, my God, thou art very great;
Thou art robed with majesty and honor;
Who veilest thyself in light as in a garment;
Who stretchest out the heavens
like a tent;
Who lays the beams of his upper chambers in the waters;
Who makes the clouds his chariot;
Who walks upon the wings of the wind;
Who makes the winds his messengers;
His ministers, flames of fire.
He founded the earth upon its pillars,
That it might not be moved forever and ever.

Thou didst cover it with the deep as with a garment;
The waters stood upon the mountains.
At thy rebuke they fled;
At the sound of thy thunder they fled in terror.
The mountains rose, the valleys
sank down,
To the place which thou hadst
founded for them.
Thou didst set a limit which they should not cross over,
So that they should not again cover the earth.

He causes fountains to flow in the valleys;
Between mountains they run.
They furnish drink for all the beasts of the field;
Wild asses quench their thirst
there.
Beside them the birds of the heavens dwell,
From among the branches they send forth song.
Thou waterest the mountains from thy upper chambers;
The earth is filled full of the fruit of thy works.
He makes grass grow for the cattle,

And fodder for the working animals
of man,
So that bread may come forth
from the earth;
And wine may cheer man's heart,
Making his face brighter than oil;
And bread to stay man's heart.

The trees of the Lord are satisfied,
The cedars of Lebanon which he planted;
Wherein the birds build their nests,
And the stork, whose home is the cypress.
The high mountains are for the wild goats;
The rocks are a refuge for the marmots.

He made the moon for fixed seasons;

Zion's Perpetual Blessing

Psalm 133

(The Songs of Ascents. Of David)

LO, how good and lovely it is When brethren dwell together as one.
Like the goodly oil upon the head,
Which flows down upon the beard,
Aaron's beard,
That flows down upon the edge of his robes,
So is the dew of Hermon that flows down upon the mountains of Zion;
For there has the Lord commanded the blessing:
Life for evermore.

The sun knows its time of setting;
He maketh darkness and it becomes night,
In which all the beasts of the forest prowl,
The young lions roaring after prey,
And seeking their food from God.
When the sun rises, they withdraw,
And crouch in their dens.
Man goes forth to his work,
And to his labor until evening.
How many are thy works, O Lord!
In wisdom thou hast made them all.

The earth is full of thy creations.
There is the sea, great and broad,
Where are creeping things innumerable:

Creatures small and great
Go there like ships;
The Leviathan whom thou didst form to play with.
They all wait upon thee,
To give them their food in due season.

What thou givest them, they gather up;
When thou openest thy hand, they are satisfied with good things.
When thou hidest thy face, they are worried;
When thou takest away their breath, they die,
And turn again into dust.
When thou sendest forth thy breath, they are created;
And thou renewest the face of the earth.

May the glory of the Lord be forever!

May the Lord rejoice in his works!
He looks at the earth and it quakes;
He touches the mountains and they smoke!

I will sing of the Lord as long as I live;

I will play praises to my Lord as long as I breathe,

May my meditation please him!
I will rejoice in the Lord.

Let sinners vanish from the earth!

And may the wicked be no more!

Let my whole being bless the Lord!

Hallelujah!

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

Meeting Helps" on Devotional Topic for October 31 THE MATCHLESS DEEDS OF CHRIST

Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in "Young People's Leader" the official magazine "For All Baptist Young People." Subscriptions to the "Leader" may be made through the B. Y. U. of America, at $1 per year.

Read the material given in the Leader carefully, noting especially the part headed "Appreciation." In addition to this, as suggested by the Leader, it would be well to read "The Man Nobody Knows" by Barton. Although the whole book deals with this subject, you may not be able to read it all. The two particularly pertinent chapters are "The Founder of Modern Business" and "The Master."

At least a week before meeting, have your group or society members each take one chapter of the book of Mark. Ask them to list, according to the analysis given in the Leader, the passages concerning the deeds of Christ. For example, the person reading the second chapter of the book might list the deed stated in the first twenty verses of the fourth chapter of Mark under "Christ as a worker." So through the book, each deed may be listed under one of the five descriptions given.

In meeting, the leader might introduce the topic by telling the things listed under "Useful Knowledge" for the general information of those present. Then, writing the words "Humanity of Jesus," "Christ as worker," "Christ of good use," "Christ with his followers," and "Christ's power" on a blackboard, the leader may call on the four previously prepared to tell how Mark brings out these descriptions of Christ. In each instance points given in the Leader may be brought in as further information on that particular description, but most of the work might be the giving of references. These are given, the place where each deed should be listed under the group to which it belongs, just as the members have done in their personal reading.

The conclusion might be the presentation of the material given under "Skill Living" in the Leader, emphasizing the thought that our work, our living, can help others only as we reflect Christ's matchless deeds.

Our Little Dime

By CHARLES A. WING

WE spend a little money for things I will admit,

Some things we take a fancy to, we do not need a bit.

It may be just a lemonade, a soda, or a lime,

But when we get inside a church, it's hard to give a dime.

We go out for a picnic and rent a boat all day

To fish or row around the lake and drive our cares away.

But when we get inside a church, and sitting in a pew

We think how much we've spent this week, we guess a dime will do.

We're glad to pay a dollar to get a real good laugh

And for a little lunch each day we gladly give a half.

But when we get inside a church we're thinking all the time.

What a great thing we are doing when we drop our little dime.

Perhaps we play a little bridge or give a little tea,

It surely costs us something, what e'er the case may be.

We do not seem to worry, we do not seem to care

Providing when we get to church we have a dime to spare.

So long as we are living, we have nothing much to fear,

But it starts a person thinking, when the end of life draws near,

And I wonder if our conscience will not smite us at the gate,

Or is heaven only worth the dime we put upon the plate?

tory of the organization. The program, featuring inspirational, educational and recreational phases, included for the morning hours classes on "Social Heart-throbs," "The Young Christian and His Bible," and "Life Work" conferences. The afternoons were given over to recreation in various phases. The "Evening Specials" included various features: a lecture on astronomy, and several inspiring and challenging addresses. The usual "Stunt Night" was an occasion of merriment. Friday evening, the closing session was given over to initiation of new members into the "Yuccas."

Especially worthy of mention was the pledge taken by the young people at an evening service in camp, that they would earnestly endeavor by the help of God to win definitely one life for Christ by the end of the year. Keenly alive to the challenge, they have introduced a note of evangelistic fervor into the church that will mean much in consecrated service during the fall and winter months.

These annual retreats in the mountains have become a big factor in the activities of the young people of First church, Ontario, serving to create a spirit of fellowship among them, a closer contact with the vital things of life, and greater than all, have brought them a deepening consciousness of the abiding reality of the Man of Galilee.

Los Angeles Looks in on Springfield

While visiting Springfield, Ill., I attended the regular monthly meeting of the City Union B. Y. P. U. One of the smaller churches on the edge of town was crowded with 125 young people from the ten locals in the city.

Promptly at 8 p.m., the "Pep" committee, three young men, took the platform and led in a roaring set of songs and cheers, and then swung into a gospel hymn, followed by a devotional period. Next there were two short speeches on plans for taking 100 people to Philadelphia next summer.

The speaker of the evening gave a fifteen-minute talk on the Christian Life Program, explaining it and telling how each local could carry it out. The city union purposes to make the C. L. P. 100 per cent in all its locals. A snappy business session followed. Two locals then produced stunts. Next came "eats," a social time, and the individual group cheers. The efficiency with which everything was carried on, the enthusiasm of every one, and the large attendance impressed me.

The Chimney Corner

Open Windows

JETHRO DEANE, walking slowly along the rough-board sidewalk that wound through the overpopulated factory neighborhood, paused to take off his panama and wipe his dark head with a fine linen handkerchief. But the pause was for more than the performance of this rite. Jethro was inclined to go away without seeing Ella Barker. It was years since he had seen her—years sufficient to change the charm of the little town with its lilac hedges and velvety, rose-bordered lawns into this!

"This" impressed itself unpleasantly upon the physical senses. The air reeked with neglected garbage and plumbing, greasy cooking, soft-coal smoke, filthy children, dirty goats, mongrel dogs; it was rent by the roar of the factory machinery, the screams of two women wrangling across a broken picket fence, the wail of a teething baby, the bark of a tortured dog. And it was in this very block, in the shadow of a mock-orange hedge, that he had kissed sunny-eyed Ella Barker. He had gone away and it was not his fault that he had not returned.

In anger at the letter of rejection he received from Ella, young Jethro had turned to thin, sallow-faced Esther Carter in the faraway city. Now she was dead, and he had been drawn back to Ella Barker's town. But though he had come a thousand miles to see her, he felt that he could not bear to see her if she were changed. And could an entire town be metamorphosed and Ella Barker remain the sweet, sunny being of his memory? He shuddered as he recalled how Esther had changed with age, as had others of their city friends. He thought he could not bear to see Ella's delicate skin touched with rouge and whitened with powder, hard lines around her ripe, tender mouth and a world-weary look in her eager violet eyes.

The big white house, over which red roses had rioted when he briefly courted Ella Barker, had been thriftily changed into "flats". Life in some unattractive form burst from every window. Ella could not be here, he told himself. Yet he stepped into the hall, still lighted by the fan-light window, and asked a fat, slovenly woman, in a dirty blue calico apron, concerning Miss Ella Barker.

"Sure she do live here!" replied the blue-aproned one, beefy arms akimbo, flat green eyes moving from the black crest of Jethro's hair to the tip of his shining shoe. "You folly up these here stairs tell you run into a door. That's her!"

These explicit directions brought Jethro face to face with a woman who seemed ageless. Her skin was the color of the skin of a peanut, and wrinkles had made a checkerboard of her face. But the eyes were not old. Bright as new shoe buttons, they peered out at the caller.

"Is Miss Ella Barker in?" questioned Jethro, knowing this was Aunt Susan, though she bore little resemblance to the straight, dominating Aunt Susan he recalled.

"What be you wanting of her?" inquired the shriveled woman.

Jethro turned away. He did not wish to see Ella Barker. The hand of time which had so unkindly left its finger-marks on the town and Aunt Susan would have dealt no more leniently with Ella.

"Nothing, madam," returned Jethro, heavily beginning the descent of the stairs. At the first landing he paused to let a woman pass. A voice with the cadences of spring in it spoke:

"You must have been to look at the flat. Wouldn't Aunt Susan let you in? She won't sometimes."

"I didn't go in," answered Jethro.

The whim seized him to play a part.

"It's for rent?" he hazarded.

"Yes, I'll show it to you," said the voice that winged him across an abyss of years.

Without looking beyond the skirt of the speaker, he followed. It was a dainty blue and white skirt, revealing worn, well-polished little shoes. The flat they entered had been the attic of the old house. There was the dormer in the front room, the ceilings sloped and in the kitchen was the rear dormer. Aunt Susan, wrapping a red woolen shawl about her in spite of the heat, followed muttering.

"It's really comfortable—at least it's not bad," amended Ella honestly.

"How long have you lived here?" asked Jethro.

"I was born here—in the house, I mean," replied Ella. "It's five years since it was made over and we took this flat."

"May I ask your reason for leaving?" pursued Jethro.

There was a silence so long that Jethro's eyes were impelled beyond the blue and white skirt up the blouse, which matched the skirt, to Ella Barker's face. He started. What had time done to her? She was changed, it was true. But it was a change that nobody, not even he, could regret. That sunniness—the quality which had been Ella's great charm—was there, intensified with the years of development.

"We must leave," said Ella at last, in a low voice. "The owner of the building has been kind——"

"I supposed you owned it since you were born here," said Jethro gruffly.

"That was long ago," answered Ella, twisting a plain, dark ring on her finger. "We've nothing in it now, but the owner let us stay anyway until the increase in his expense makes it necessary that he rent it."

Jethro's eyes were on the ring. "Isn't that a horse chestnut ring?" he demanded.

Ella started and hid her hand in embarrassment. She looked up and met the man's eyes.

"Why, it's Jethro!" she cried.

"And that's the ring I carved for you isn't it, Ella?"

"Jethro!" quavered Aunt Susan, peering up at him with her beady black eyes. "I been wanting to see you, Jethro. I changed her letter refusing that worthless Tom Nolan into your envelope, and I burned the honey and mush letter she'd writ to you saying she'd marry you. She'd no business to marry when I'd brought her up. I did right, but now I'm getting near the grave I want it off my conscience."

Wild-eyed, Ella stared from shriveled Aunt Susan to frowning Jethro.

"Did you think I refused to marry you?" she whispered.

"The letter I got said so," answered Jethro bitterly, turning his back on the old woman.

"Ella Barker," said Jethro when they were washing up the blue and white supper dishes while Aunt Susan, in her red shawl, dozed in a corner, "how have you kept as young and sweet as though these thousand years hadn't passed and you hadn't been having the hardest kind of a life through them all?"

"Do you think that Jethro—that I've kept young and sweet?"

"Have you? Oh, my dear!"

"Then it's the open windows, Jethro. I've tried to keep the windows of my soul open to everything good and enriching. It's been open windows literally and figuratively. I had the sink placed beneath the kitchen dormer—see the silver ribbon of a river winding away off there below! When I've grubbed at the sink my mind's not been in the sink, but off with that beauty, traveling with the river. I've watched for sunsets and birds and flowers and children's happy faces. I determined that hard work, poverty, even living with Aunt Susan would not close the windows of my soul."

"My dear, I'm rich, but I wonder if I can even begin to give you what you've found for yourself all of these years!"

"You couldn't give it to me, Jethro—nobody could," said Ella, approaching close with the snowy dish-towel in her hand. "But neither can you take it from me. I shan't mind your being rich, for it's not going to close the windows of my soul."

When Heavenly Blossoms Came to Town*

BY MARGARET T. APPEGARTH

WHILE our brand new Miss Missionary was picking her way gingerly down the street of a certain Chinese town, stepping from stone to stone, and trying hard not to fall in the oozy mud, she overheard this conversation between two Chinese gentlemen in long blue silk coats:

Said gentleman number one, bowing solemnly: "Has it reached your distinguished ears that heavenly blossoms have come to town?"

Said gentleman number two, bowing politely in return: "Your words fill me with dismay! I trust the blossoms have not bloomed within your own gateposts?" "But alas, yes!" answered gentleman number one sadly, "for my inside-the-house-man tells me she notices our little town has them."

"I weep with you," sighed the second gentleman, shaking his head dolefully. Hereupon, with many polite good-byes, the two friends parted, and Miss Missionary balanced herself on a big cobblestone to think things over.

"That was Mr. Wang who spoke first," she said to herself, "and I must say it's a funny time of year to have blossoms coming, now that everybody is all bundled up in wadded winter jackets! But if blossoms are blooming in spite of the weather, why did they both seem so melancholy about it? I had better go and call on Mrs. Wang—it's been a long time since I've been there, anyhow."

So she turned around and picked her way through the mud to the particular house with the red tip-up roofs where the Wangs lived.

Once inside, you would have laughed to see the polite family pulling at her skirts: "Sit up higher!" they urged, "do sit up higher"—trying to push her into the seat of highest honor near the ancestral tablets; but even a new Miss Missionary knows enough to keep modestly near the door, so she sank into a chair and began on the usual polite questions, while she sipped a cup of tea.

"I hope you have peace, Mrs. Wang," she said.

"Your heavenly question flatters my worthy health," said Mrs. Wang, bowing. "I have peace!"

"And all the little Wangs—have they peace also?" asked Miss Missionary.

"All but Kom Loi," said Mrs. Wang, "our poor little spider has heavenly blossoms."

"At last!" smiled Miss Missionary to herself, "at last I shall see these queer Chinese blossoms that bloom in winter!" Aloud, she said: "You act as if they made him miserable. I know how precious Kom Loi is to you, and if these blossoms are making him unhappy why do you let him have them?"

Mrs. Wang opened her narrow slant eyes to their very widest: "Let him?" she gasped, "oh surely you know that it is the gods who send us heavenly blossoms, so what can a miserable mother do but take offerings to the temple and tie red rags around the smallpox goddess?"

"Smallpox?" cried Miss Missionary excitedly, "why, what has smallpox got to do with heavenly blossoms?"

The little mother clasped her hands in distress: "You are so new in our country that your honorable ears have not heard that smallpox is the same as heavenly blossoms which the angry gods send so often that in China it is hardly safe to count your children until they have been speckled all over with the red blossoms. For alas, they die so easily!"

Miss Missionary felt like dashing straight out the front door, for just like all of us she was scared to hear that fatal word, smallpox; but she bravely sat in her seat, holding her teacup and wondering how she could help this equally scared little mother.

"What have you done for the little fellow?" she asked sympathetically.

"Well, yesterday we all went and tied red rags around the smallpox goddess—for she loves red, you know," she said, quite loud, then in a whisper she added: "Just come out in the hall away from the idols on the idol-shelf and I'll tell you a secret!"

She hobbled on her little bound feet into the hallway, Miss Missionary tagging along behind. Once out there in the dark, the little mother whispered: "I didn't want the idols or the door god to hear how I played a trick on them, for they must be provoked at our family already! But last night, when it was dark and the gods couldn't see, I wrapped Kom Loi in a piece of old matting and carried him over to my neighbor's, and she loaned me her little son to sleep on Kom Loi's bed while Kom Loi sleeps with her children. Isn't that a fine trick? For when the evil spirits tip-toe to Kom Loi's bed to gloat over his ugly red speckles and hear him groan, it won't be a sick boy there at all, but my neighbor's little well son! Oh, but they will be fooled! And I thought of it all myself, for in years past three of my little sons slipped away in death to join their ancestors, because the angry gods sent heavenly blossoms."

The Lantern Maker

BY JANET GARGAN

*On the green little isle of Japan,
In a bamboo-built fishing town,
Lived the old lantern maker, a man
Who was wrinkled and bent and brown;*

*But he carried his lanterns each day
Down the street, all strung on a pole—
And he bartered them, painted and gay,
For so little—for just a dole!*

*But he said: "Oh, the little ones laugh
While they watch my lanterns so bright—*

*So it is that I sell them for half!
Will you buy one to hang tonight?
Does it matter at night I work long?
Or hard is my bed-mat of rush?*

*I am happy and humming a song
While flowers grow under my brush.*

"When the 'Feast of the Lanterns' comes 'round,

*They are mine that the little maids
Will then swing as they march to the sound*

*Of song in the village parades;
As the lanterns, quick bobbing, go by
With their fragments of candles lit,
They will look like the stars from night's sky
Coaxed down to delight us a bit."*

Dear Boys and Girls:

This poem on Japan is put here to remind you of the story and the big suggestion made to you by "Peggy" last August that each of you should turn explorer and send a doll representative on a tour of discovery to Japan. So few of you have written to me about your interest in this thrilling project that here I come a-begging! Won't some of you please write to tell me that you are dressing dolls for Japan? Won't you please tell me whether you are working on a doll alone, or as a family, or in your school, or in your church? I know all the other boys and girls who read this column would like to know what you are doing and how you are doing it; also what you have named your doll. There is a story in the October Everyland where a doll named Belinda Jane was renamed "Merry Can," a play on the word American, because there is no end to the merry a doll can put into the friendship between young Japan and young America!

In fact the October Everyland is full of stories about these dolls. You will be sure to enjoy "The Long, Long Journey of Little Bo Peep," "The Message of the Dolls," and the pictures. If you are full of questions about this, write to "Doll Travel Bureau," 289 Fourth ave., New York, N. Y.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

CLEARs INDEBTEDNESS

While Rev. Edker Burton, pastor of the Moscow, Ida., church, was away on a two-weeks' vacation, the members of his congregation put on a money-raising campaign. Their object was to clear the church of all indebtedness incurred by improvement of property and otherwise. The cash and pledges which will be paid by the first of the coming year were sufficient to cover everything and the pastor returned to a church which had a clean slate.

CLEARING UP A MISUNDERSTANDING

Doctor Agar, stewardship and church efficiency secretary for the Board of Missionary Cooperation, counts among his friends an influential business man, who is also a leader in the affairs of the local Baptist church to which he belongs. This man surprised Doctor Agar not long ago by saying that he "was sick and tired of the way in which the denomination was trying to lord it over the local church."

"For instance?" inquired Doctor Agar. "Well," he said, "what right has the denomination to assess our church $10,000?"

"It hasn't assessed you $10,000. You don't know what you are talking about." At that he bridled and said, "Well,

I do, because some one told me it was being done and I have no reason to disbelieve it."

Doctor Agar then went on to explain to his friend the whole matter of making the church quotas, and by the time he had finished, the business man admitted that his former point of view had been entirely wrong. "After this," he said "I shall help to see that my church really considers what is its share of the total sums needed for all Baptist work done under the auspices of the Northern Baptist Convention, at home and abroad."

The entire conversation which Doctor Agar held with the man is printed in the leaflet, "The Facts About the Church Quotas." It may be obtained free of charge from any literature bureau, or from your state convention office. Any one who is in doubt about the way in which quotas are made would do well to send for it.

SUCCESSFUL VACATION SCHOOLS

Many churches report success and agreeable experiences in connection with vacation Bible schools. The Rupert, Ida., church expects to make its school an annual event and heartily commends the idea. The vacation school in Middleton, Ida., resulted in the conversion of thirty-two children. The attendance at the concluding service of the daily vacation

Bible school of the Hungarian mission in Highland Park, Detroit, Mich., proved nearly three times the capacity of the store-front meeting house where the school was held. The vacation school held in connection with the Nebraska Baptist Assembly carried with it multiple advantages. It permitted the family to enjoy the privileges of the assembly together; it enabled parents to attend who otherwise would have been prevented from attending because of the children; and it provided entertainment and training for the children themselves.

A GOOD EXAMPLE

Washington Avenue church, Huntington, W. Va., Rev. J. T. Tucker, pastor, may well be proud of sixty tithers out of a membership of 500, a group adding numbers to itself as time passes. This church and its Bible school, crowded out of inadequate quarters, is forced within a year into a building enterprise of large proportions. While purchasing lots and contributing to its building fund, Washington Avenue church never forgets its missionary quota, and the first of every month Dr. A. S. Kelley, state secretary, receives a check covering one-twelfth of the total accepted missionary responsibility. In the lean months of congregational receipts, the one-twelfth is safeguarded, if necessary, by a note at the bank.

AN INTERESTING SUPPLEMENT

As a supplement to the Northern California Baptist Bulletin a statement is published showing the suggested and accepted missionary goals, the total amount paid, the amount paid per capita and the number of payments to date of publication of every church in the convention. In this interesting statement, the churches of each association are grouped together and one may tell at a glance how an individual church stands. The following section of the August supplement which is devoted to the San Francisco Bay Association churches illustrates the plan and arrangement of the table:

Among Ourselves

Letter from South China

BY ADAM F. GROESBECK

(This letter from the pen of Doctor Groesbeck who has spent a quarter of a century in China is one of the clearest interpretations of affairs in China that we have read. Do not fail to read it.—Editor)

DURING the summer I attended two conferences of Chinese Christian leaders. The groups which these conferences represented have little in common except their religion, and that is of a different type. They belong to different provinces, and for years have been under differing governments. In spite of these variances, political, social, and denominational, they have a common belief that they stand on the threshold of a new day in China, a day that is to be characterized by a new social order, a new regime of popular government, and a new place for their country in the brotherhood of nations.

The first of these assemblies was the conference and annual meeting of the independent church of South China, usually called the Ling Tong church. This church has been organized but one year. This was my first experience in a meeting of the new organization. I wondered what it would do, and how, with so little experience, it would be able to conduct business. Any doubts in my mind regarding the ability of the members to discuss and conduct their own affairs were quickly dissipated. They know what they had to do and go about it like "old conference hands."

"Old conference hands"—that suggests a real weakness of the new organization. It lacks the imperfections of inexperience, as far as machinery goes. It seems rather to belong to the highly perfected, stereotyped class of convention. It is tempted to say that were the organization less perfect, there would be more hope, for much might be learned from mistakes which now seem likely never to be made.

Government by Talk

To be sure, this weakness is not peculiar to Chinese assemblies. It is one of the ills of organization to which the whole world seems to be heir. Talk, planning and letting it go at that, without seeing the thing through, is common in the best ordered conferences. Politics, Lloyd George calls this government by talk." L. P. Jacks characterizes it as "the substitution of talk for the thing for the reality of doing it." We have all been participants in conferences of this kind preparatory to a "drive" or "special campaign." When we had talked out and adjourned we believed the thing was accomplished. Later we awoke to the fact that nothing had been done. The Ling Tong church has quickly reached this advanced stage of development. One hopes that it will learn how to "perform the doing of it" after the "readiness" displayed in planning and discussing. When it has learned how, perhaps it will teach us the secret of its success.

Instead of bringing up church problems in the popular assembly where only a few would have an opportunity to discuss them, teachers and pastors spent a week threshing out the problems connected with the establishment of an indigenous church. In this pre-conference gathering the main body broke up into smaller groups for further and intimate discussion after the subject in hand had been presented. The groups came together again and formulated their findings or recommendations to be made to the annual meeting of the Ling Tong church the following week. One of these discussion groups was formed entirely of women leaders. Their work showed no inferiority, not even an inferiority complex.

There were a few men on the side lines who evidently regretted the bold step toward independence taken the year before. These men were distinctly not the leaders. The movement for an independent church is a part of the popular development of nationalism. Here in the South it is directly connected with the Sun Yat-sen movement for popular government. Sun Yat-sen wrote out his ideas of government which he styled "The Three Principles of Government or Democracy." They are the principles enunciated by President Lincoln when he said, "Government of the people, by the people, for the people." This is for what the present Canton government stands. It is using, to some extent, the Russian bolshevist methods of propaganda; at the same time it is trying to avoid bolshevism itself and to establish Sun Yat-sen's ideal democracy instead. The leader of the expedition against the North, before leaving Canton for the front, reaffirmed his vow to fight, and if need be to die, for Sun Yat-sen's principles. It is called a military expedition, but it is much more. Fully as much preparation for propaganda has been made as for fighting. It is proposed to undermine the courage and fighting qualities of the North by the preaching of the Sun Yat-sen gospel of democracy and human rights. The Chinese press has called public attention to this phase of the expedition. While the army is at the front fighting and preaching, every school-teacher behind the lines is a Sun Yat-sen evangelist. Public assemblies of all sorts make use of Sun Yat-sen's book much as we make use of the Bible. The cadet's school at Canton is not for the training of warriors so much as to imbue the boys with the idea of bringing in a new social order even at the cost of life itself, and for success depends more on truth than on force.

The Undercurrent

So one could not but feel the deep undercurrent of nationalism running through the conference. The outstanding leader in the conference said in private, "The success or failure of the military expedition North is immaterial. The truth will ultimately win." Wu Peifu may defeat the southern army, but the people are sure that he cannot defeat their cause, for that rests on a faith no sword can reach. This is not all the evidence that a new day dawns in China. May 1, the farmers from the surrounding region came into Chaoyang for the parade. It rained all day, but a crowd, reported to number 30,000, came and was harangued by the leaders of the farmers' union. In an adjoining county, there were almost as many on parade. The slogan of the movement is, "This is the day of the common man." This new order may not be what the rest of the world would like to see, but whether we like it or not, it is on the way. The more opposition it meets, the more bolshevist it is likely to become and the less like the spirit of Lincoln to whose words the movement owes so much. The church will find it impossible to keep out of the movement, and should it keep out?

Prayer

BY LAYETTE E. ELDRED

"PRAYER is the soul's sincere desire, Unuttered or expressed;

The motion of a hidden fire
That trembles in the breast."

Prayer is the upward lifted eye
That seeks a Saviour's face;
The burden of a waited sigh
Up to a throne of grace.

Prayer is the ladder Jacob saw,
To heart-sick mortals given,
On which they climb above their griefs
To find the peace of heaven.

Prayer is the mounting of the soul
On faith's triumphant wing;
When some great victory attained
Has made the heart to sing.

Prayer is the nestling of a child
Within its Father's arms,
Whose warm embrace shall hold it close,
Secure from all alarms.

Whatever brings us close in touch
With God's eternal care,
And makes us feel that he is real,
This is the soul's true prayer.

The other conference held near Amoy, in the Fukien province, was composed of the pastors of the churches in that region. Mission work began at Amoy more than seventy years ago. The Dutch Reformed church of America, the English Presbyterians, and the London mission have all sent representatives to this field. Many converts have been won and flourishing churches established, but there is only one Chinese church, entirely independent of the respective missions except in financial support.

I was invited to give ten lectures on any subject I cared to present. I chose "Jesus, the Teacher." I avoided theology, books of all sorts, especially commentaries, and tried to get the group to study Jesus himself, and what he taught his disciples regarding the great truths of redemption.

The fellowship of the missionaries, representative of two boards, and scores of Chinese pastors, was delightful. Our hostess was Miss Zwemer, sister of the famous missionary to the Moslems. It was worth a long trip to hear her speak familiarly of that great man as "Sam". We have often heard the story of the missionary who in describing Jesus, his love and compassion, and how he healed the sick, was interrupted by one of his hearers, who alleged that he knew Jesus, for he used to live in his village. The missionary who had lived so like his Master that a description of Jesus fitted him was Samuel Zwemer's brother, who was also a missionary, not so well known as the one of whom we heard so much, but evidently not less saintly.

The meetings were held in the assembly room of the school building. I was somewhat surprised to find a large engraving of Lincoln on the wall. The man in charge of the school, when questioned why that particular picture adorned the wall, replied, "The pupils insisted on having a picture of Lincoln." A course of study running through the entire conference was on "Jesus' Way of Life." Any expression of sympathy with the ideals of new China was received with great appreciation. It was evident that these representatives of the church where the political waters seem so placid were expectant and desirous of meeting the demands of the new day in the spirit of Jesus.

A New China in the Making

A Chinese recently resented the accusation that the Chinese are anti-foreign and anti-British. His claim was, "We are anti-everything that opposes us in reaching our ideal of a free and equal China in the family of nations." Russia is the popular nation because it is (with what motive, I shall not discuss) assisting the Chinese toward the attainment of their goal. The Chinese are making a new classification of foreigners under two heads: "Those that are for us, and those that are against us." The nationality of the foreigner is rapidly losing its importance in the estimation of the Chinese. A man called my attention to this, and pressed home his point by appealing to the recent visit of a British labor union man to Canton. "In spite of the feeling toward Great Britain, this man was not ostracized but welcomed and feted." Repeatedly I have heard men say, "We are using Russian men and Russian methods for our own ends;" that when the building is completed, the scaffolding will be cast aside. With this agrees the oft-repeated assurance of General Feng. Let us hope that the Chinese in the meantime will not permit bolshevism to get a strangle hold on their affairs. A new China is in the making, and only those countries and missions that join with China in this regeneration will be permitted to share in the glory of a great, new day.

The Summer at Northfield

THERE are few places equal to Northfield, Mass., during vacation. The natural scenery is beautiful as is the whole New England country. An automobile trip through Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine will provide as much satisfaction as can be derived from a similar trip through any part of the United States. While little of the grand and majestic may appear, there is much that is quietly beautiful which brings rest and refreshment to the soul.

There is no other town just like Northfield, even in New England. Its one long, main street with its majestic elms and maples, its typical early New England residences, makes a lasting impression. Roadways lead from this main highway in every direction and furnish pleasant rides. Longer drives reveal numerous towns and cities. One afternoon a friend took me for a drive and pointed out Smith college, Mt. Holyoke college, Amherst college, Massachusetts agricultural college, Deerfield academy and Mount Hermon school for boys. We were back in time for dinner and broke no speed limits. Those who think there are too many colleges in the northwest should travel in New England. The northwest has resources which will support many times the population supported in New England.

Northfield was the birthplace and home of Dwight L. Moody. His influence still pervades the whole community. The Northfield seminary for girls, in Northfield, and the Mount Hermon school for boys, four miles away across the Connecticut river, founded by him, are institutions which are steadily growing stronger. The new president of these schools is Rev. Elliot Speer, a young man twenty-seven years of age, son of Dr. Robert E. Speer.

Northfield seminary is not deserted during the summer. Before Mr. Moody passed away he arranged for various conferences to meet there annually and erected an auditorium, seating approximately 4000 people, to accommodate the crowds. The past summer conferences began in June and continued to the middle of August. Among them were the student Y. M. C. A., the Christian Endeavor, the women's missionary organizations, the religious education and the general conference. The large attendance is amazing, especially when the comparative inaccessibility of the place is considered. Through these gatherings the influence of Northfield spreads. It is a wholesome influence. The spirit of controversy is lacking. The messages are constructive and uplifting. The gospel of love and good fellowship is given a fair chance at the minds and hearts of all.

Baptist leaders made contributions to these gatherings this summer as they have in former years. The Y. M. C. A. conference was under the management of Dr. Raymond B. Culver and Dr. Kenneth Scott Latourette was one of the speakers. Mrs. Helen B. Montgomery and Mrs. H. W. Peabody were leaders in the missionary conferences. Dr. A. W. Beaven spoke at the Christian Endeavor meeting. The general conference was the most important of all. Here an outstanding figure was Dr. A. T. Robertson of Louisville, Ky., whose messages are heard yearly with pleasure and profit. Among other Baptists were Drs. Avery A. Shaw, J. C. Massee and G. B. Cutten, president of Colgate university.

Leading speakers of other denominations were Dr. John Gardner of California; Dr. George A. Buttrick of Buffalo, N. Y.; Melvin E. Trotter of Grand Rapids, Mich.; Dr. James I. Vance of the Southland; Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of New York City; Dr. Harris E. Kirk of Baltimore; Dr. James Moffat of Glasgow, Scotland. Doctor Moffat, widely known through his translation of the New Testament, attracted considerable attention. His lectures on "The Doctrine of Love in the New Testament" were thoroughgoing studies, perhaps not clearly followed by all of his hearers, trained Bible students though they were supposed to be. His distinction between sentimentalism and love is worth remembering. "Sentimentalism is enjoyment without obligation. Love is enjoyment with obligation." In Doctor Moffat's judgment, love in the New Testament is inseparably connected with a sense of responsibility. These studies and many of the other messages will appear in the Record of Christian Work published at East Northfield, Mass. Pastors generally will find them suggestive in connection with sermon building.

Alton, Illinois, Association

By C. W. WEBB

THE Alton Association held its annual meeting at the First church, Wood River, Sept. 29-30. The association was preceded by a banquet at 6:30 p. m. Tuesday given by the associational brotherhood and attended by a large number of laymen and women. Two addresses were given on "Men and the Kingdom of God." Following the banquet a meeting was held in the auditorium of the church at which time Rev. H. Lee McLendon of Centralia spoke on "Do We Need a New Bible?"

The association opened at 10:30 a. m. Wednesday with Dr. S. D. McKenny presiding. Because of inclement weather only 135 people were registered but an enthusiastic spirit prevailed. The annual sermon, reached by Rev. H. B. Cox of Benton on "Three Cs," was a masterly message well received by all present. Letters from churches showed a gain in membership for the year but a slight decrease in the number of baptisms, there being 579 this year against 595 last year. The financial report showed a gain in missionary giving.

Miss Isabelle Crawford, missionary among the Indians for many years, gave a vivid account of her work before the meeting of the ladies' missionary union.

Thursday evening Sunday school and young people's work was discussed. Rev. O. Hopkins, speaking in place of Rev. Dr. Koehler, gave an address on "The Sunday-school Teacher and His Bible" pointing out that the Sunday-school teacher must above all else know and teach his Bible. Rev. Herbert W. Hines, pastor of central church, Springfield, Ill., spoke to the young people on "Our Young People's Work," declaring that the young people should be given equal responsibility with the older church members.

Dr. S. D. McKenny, of Alton, was again elected moderator and Rev. C. W. Webb, of Benton, clerk and treasurer. Rev. Zeck Ford Bond of East St. Louis was appointed trustee of the Judelson home; Rev. H. B. Cox, of Benton, member of the state board; and Harold Howard of Mt. Vernon, young people's leader.

The association will meet in Litchfield next year.

"Regional Conferences" in Europe

THE policy of holding "regional" conferences this year instead of a general European congress is already vindicated by the experience of the first and second of these gatherings. The five Latin countries of southern and western Europe (Portugal, Spain, France, Italy, Belgium) were each represented by delegates to the Barcelona conference which opened the series. Held in the city associated with the historic voyage of Columbus and still the commercial capital of Spain, it enabled a clear witness for evangelical and Baptist principles to be offered where it was needed sadly. The rectory in Spain has shown itself intolerant; interference with Protestant worship and preaching has frequently taken place; and there was reason to fear that the conference might be forbidden by the officials. It was allowed, however, and the visit of Doctor Mullins enabled him to set forth with strength and clearness the main lines of our denominational testimony. His speeches and sermons heartened the people, and the Barcelona assembly represents a high-water mark in the story of evangelical work in Spain. For the first time, the presence of a large group of Baptists from other lands brought home to the members of our relatively small Spanish community, in a country where Roman Catholicism is overwhelmingly strong, the fact that they are linked with millions of fellow believers who are keenly interested in their welfare. I had the privilege of setting forth the Baptist view of the relations of church and state and of delivering other addresses on fundamental issues. Doctor Gill and Doctor Lewis ably represented the two great conventions of America, and Major Town, the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland.

The Barcelona conference was extremely encouraging and considering that it was held in Spain, the large attendance was significant. In external impressiveness, however, it was outdone by the Budapest conference which followed, at the close of which I am writing. Hungarian Baptists secured for the opening and closing demonstrations one of the largest halls in the city, and brought together the largest denominational gathering ever known in the land. In addition to the hundreds of Hungarians, nearly forty delegates attended from Jugoslavia; almost as many Roumanians were present; Czecho-Slovakia was strongly represented; and Austria sent its contingent. A choir of 200 voices furnished an excellent program of sacred music. The ministry was represented, and the secular press gave much space to reports of these meetings.

The president of the alliance was at his best in addressing the great crowds. Rev. M. E. Aubrey, successor to Dr. J. H. Shakespeare in the secretaryship of the British Union, had been specially commissioned to represent the British Baptists; and, I speak as their president, the Budapest conference marks the opening of a new chapter in the relations of the Baptists of Great Britain with their brethren in Europe. The attendance of Mr. Aubrey and myself was symbolic of the growth among Baptists in Britain of a sense of solidarity with our comrades abroad and of our resolve to cultivate a closer fellowship. All through the conference, which was held in the First church of Budapest, as well as in the two great public meetings, the sense of unity in Christ was dominant.

There was an undertone of indignation at the repression still exercised in Roumania, where in many cases travel permits had been refused to delegates who wished to attend the conference; but from every land of southeastern Europe, including Roumania, the story of numerical and spiritual advance stirred profound gratitude. The hold of Baptist teaching upon the young manhood of this part of Europe was evident, and the self sacrifice and courage of the brethren are beyond praise. The effort which Doctor Mullins has made by his presidential tour has been worth while even if nothing more should be accomplished than the ministry of help and encouragement to these splendid Baptists. It is good to know that in recent years they have been substantially assisted by the foreign mission board of the Southern Baptist Convention and (as far as Czecho-Slovakia is concerned) by the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and the British Union.

A keen interest has been displayed in the World Congress to be held in Toronto in 1928; it is hoped that American Baptists will give such assistance as will enable many to cross the Atlantic. It was a great thing to bring Doctor Mullins into contact with the brethren in some of the centers of population over here; it will mean even more to bring hundreds of Europeans into touch with the great communities of Baptists beyond the ocean.

It is a happy company of three Americans and two British that has set forth on this pilgrimage to centers of Baptist life. Do not think of us—even of president Mullins—as merely giving; we are gaining. These comparatively young communities often display the defects of immaturity, but in respect to self-sacrificing devotion and simple piety older Baptist bodies might sit reverently at their feet and learn of them.

Budapest, Sept. 19, 1926.

Cora McCandlish Lovett

An Appreciation

By W. O. STOVALL

THE many friends of Cora McCandlish Lovett both in this country and on the foreign mission fields will be saddened to learn of her death, Sept. 18, at her home in Detroit.

Mrs. Lovett was born fifty-three years ago in Arlington, Neb., and spent her early years in Omaha, Neb., Davenport, Iowa, and Chicago. She served as a missionary in Japan under the Congregational Women's Board of Missions of the Interior 1897-1902. She suffered a physical breakdown while in Japan from which she never completely recovered.

Oct. 25, 1902, she was married to Rev. W. P. Lovett, then pastor of a Baptist church in Bay City, Mich. The place she made for herself in the hearts of the people and the stimulus she gave the work through her earnestness and qualities of leadership show that she was peculiarly qualified to fill the responsible position of pastor's wife. This position she filled for almost ten years during her husband's pastorates at Bay City and Grand Rapids, Mich., and Boise, Ida.

For the past sixteen years Mrs. Lovett's work was largely in connection with the Warren Avenue church of Detroit and the Women's Baptist Missionary Society of Michigan. Although a change in her husband's work made their home no longer a pastor's home, her interest in the work did not relax and she became a leader among the women of the Warren Avenue church, and her co-workers in that church give to her much of the credit for the effectiveness of the work of that church both locally and in its missionary program.

Mrs. Lovett served as vice-president of the women's missionary society of Michigan and was frequently engaged in the missionary cause at different points throughout the state. She was always most acceptable as a speaker on association and convention programs. Those who had the privilege of listening to her will recall her winsome personality and her unaffected sincerity.

She is survived by her husband, W. P. Lovett; one brother, Ernest H. McCandlish, of Alameda, Calif.; two daughters, Mrs. R. W. Blackmur, and Miss Marion Lovett; and one son, Eldon, of Detroit.

Are We Deceived?

WE HEAR and read much, these days, of the eighteenth amendment, and the efforts directed toward repeal or modification. There is evidently honest difference of opinion regarding the efficacy and the desirability of this amendment. Where this opinion is unfavorable it may usually be traced to the influence of statements originally made by those with personal interests at stake. They do not, of course, admit as their motive a desire for financial or political profit, or for personal appetite indulgence. They claim as the basis of their efforts a concern for the ultimate welfare of our country, the moral influence upon our young people and kindred objectives. The objectives presented are cleverly chosen, for they are undeniably desirable and worthy of strenuous efforts for attainment. But the most active and elastic imagination fails to reveal how the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment could contribute to their attainment. On the other hand, even a casual consideration reveals the personal motives behind the agitation.

One Fact

Let us bear in mind that a statement of conditions is reliable only in proportion to the reliability of the individual or group making it. When a public official who, in taking office, has sworn to obey and to uphold the law, openly boasts that he and his colleagues deliberately violate that section of the law of which they do not approve, how high a value does he put upon his honor, his integrity and his pledged word? How great credence should we give to his assertions and how deeply should his statements influence us? Yet the charges made against the eighteenth amendment are in many cases brought by just such officials.

Another Fact

Let us further bear in mind that conclusions drawn from statements even of facts are reliable only in proportion to the reliability, the disinterestedness and the purity of motive of those drawing the conclusions. Suppose that a group of individuals realizes that a clever linking of unrelated statistics or a statement of cause and effect which, without careful investigation seems plausible enough, will materially aid the attainment of its personal desires. The temptation to such adroit manipulation of facts is inevitable unless the personal and group sense of honor prevails. Some of those who are publicly and admittedly identified with and active in the anti-prohibition agitation have figured in newspaper publicity which justified serious doubt as to their possession of any sense of honor. Does it not seem reasonable that such honorable and right-minded members as the group may number would confine the membership to those of like personal standards unless the movement had been initiated and was being controlled by the less worthy element? In such event we are justified in questioning the reliability and trustworthiness of their deductions.

Let us not be deceived. The "wet" propaganda is sometimes "powerful persuasive," as Mose remarked of the bandit's revolver which was poked between his ribs. But, like that revolver, it is not in the place where it belongs, and is being used for an unworthy purpose. Motives and methods may well be submitted to careful scrutiny.

In the meantime, in our thinking about the eighteenth amendment and in our voting to return to congress only those who will support it, we shall lose nothing by standing with President Coolidge, who believes in it; with Chief Justice Taft of the United States supreme court, who upholds it; with United States Attorney-General Sargent, who unqualifiedly endorses it; with the great majority of the United States senators and representatives and also the members of state legislatures who supported and still support it; and with the vast numbers of business men, doctors, teachers, scientists, carpenters, brick layers, farmers and merchants who are solidly behind it.

The "dry-wet" controversy is the most important political issue before our country today. If we believe in the righteousness of prohibition as a national principle, let us "say it with votes" regardless of party lines.—National civic committee of the W. A. B. F. M. S. and the W. A. B. H. M. S., Jennie C. Eulette, chairman.

Bones

BY DAVID F. NYGREN

FIRST there're the wish bones, "Oh, I wish!"

"I wish I could!" "I wish I had!"

They wish and starve with empty dish, They're good for nothing, oh, how sad.

Then there're the jaw bones, "We tell you!"

"Hear us, we know!" "Aye, aye, aye, aye!"

They stick around as tight as glue And talk! Twix do and die, they die.

Thank goodness, there's the back bone too!

Not wish, not word, but modest deed, We have these folks and not a few, And yet, more back bone folks we need.

passing the 200 mark. Including the conservatory of music, the number of day students registered is over 250; the night school registration brings the total to nearly 300. The marked advance made in 1925-26 apparently was only an indication of what the centennial year will bring. Progress in all fields of college activity is marked. Especially is growth noted in the athletic department; a powerful football team is bidding for state honors, having defeated Illinois college in the opening game. Dr. Charles Durden of the First church of Bloomington, a member of the board of trustees, delivered the opening address to the student body.

PRES. JOHN M. WELLS of Grand Island college preached in the Congregational church at Grand Island and in the Baptist church at Cairo recently. He also spoke to the Kiwanis club on the constitution of the United States and addressed the rotary club on "The Ideal of Service as the Basis of all Worthy Enterprises."

The Missouri Baptist General Association will hold its annual sessions Oct. 18-22 in St. Louis in the auditorium of the Third church. A committee of one hundred, representing the churches of the St. Louis Association, has been formed with A. W. Payne as chairman, to arrange for the entertainment of the association by the St. Louis churches.

THE FORMAL OPENING of the Mullins Memorial nursery in Adoniram Judson Hall, the larger of two apartment houses for married students at Southern Baptist theological seminary, took place recently. Children of married students are to be looked after in the nursery that their mothers as well as fathers may attend classes if they desire. Included in the nursery equipment are toys, chairs and tables, picture books and story books, a piano, a playhouse, wall paintings and baby beds.

White Birches

BY G. A. LEICHLITER

(On the hills of New Brunswick)

TWO birches stand like virgins With faces heavenward turned,

And arms outspread

As if imploring worthy benediction

Upon unblemished life.

So white and straight they are;

How like an uncorrupted soul,

A faithful, upright mind.

How like the life

Untouched by sinister desire,

Or an ambition unseared

By fires of fierce uncharitable greed.

White, tall, straight;

Crowned by every rising sun

And kissed by each

Descending evening shade,

These holy virgins of the verdant hills.

Roumanian Baptist Convention

BY THEODORE M. BRAM

THE Roumanian Baptist Convention held at Cleveland, Sept. 3-7, was the finest in the history of the association. Love and unity prevailed throughout the whole session and the presence of the Holy Spirit was felt. Individual churches and leaders pledged themselves to forget the past and stand united, setting for themselves the association goal: "The cause for which Jesus, the son of God, came into the world and died, to carry the 'good tidings' to the hundreds of thousands of unsaved Roumanian-speaking people of America."

The constitution of the convention was modified; the Crestinul was entrusted for future publication to a committee of five; and a few minor changes of office were made. The convention is formulating plans to raise funds to send workers among the Roumanian colonies in the United States. The association is beginning to have its own seminary and college trained graduates; the thing which is lacking now is money to carry on the work.

COVENANT CHURCH, Chicago, held an interesting home-coming social Friday evening, Sept. 24. Pastor W. W. Chandler is planning a series of meetings.

IN SIXTEEN MONTHS of the pastorate of Miles O. Wolfe at Independence Avenue, Kansas City, Mo., 101 members have come into the church, fifty by baptism, and nearly all in the regular services. FIRST CHURCH, Wheaton, Ill., has called Rev. Charles L. Bromley to succeed Dr. Smith Thomas Ford. It has also set a record for courtesy by writing letters to all persons who suggested either their own names or the names of others for consideration as candidates for the pastorate, thanking all of them and expressing appreciation of their efforts. More than fifty names were so suggested.

ASSOCIATIONS AND state conventions throughout the Northern Baptist Convention are taking the evangelistic program seriously and are making elaborate provision for it in their programs.

Rev. E. G. Shouse of Indianapolis died of apoplexy Sept. 25.

COLUMBUS BAPTIST Association, Ohio, passed a resolution affirming "believers' baptism by immersion only, prerequisite to church membership and the Lord's Supper." Later, a conference of pastors called to consider the action issued a statement that the resolution was offered in violation of an agreement to avoid raising this question in any manner reflecting criticism upon the Northern Baptist Convention, and was presented and passed near the end of the session when few delegates remained. These pastors condemned by name the author of the resolution as having failed to keep faith with the solutions committee and having taken an fair advantage of the churches. While using their approval of the action of the association so taken, they say in a signed statement: "We wish to reaffirm our belief in believers' baptism and to pledge anew our consecrated efforts to keep our respective churches loyal to the faith and practices of our beloved denomination."

FIRST CHURCH, Terre Haute, releases pastor Roy B. Deer three days every week during the current quarter to hold association conferences on evangelism throughout the state of Indiana under the sanction of the state convention.

CHICAGO BAPTIST SOCIAL UNION is entering its fiftieth year. Its semi-centennial anniversary will be fittingly celebrated in January. Dr. J. C. Massee will be the speaker Nov. 2.

IT WOULD BE HARD to pack into a church bulletin a greater variety of interesting matter than Pastor Rhoades of Indianapolis, Ind., manages to pack into a single newspapered sheet.

CLUMET ASSOCIATION, Indiana, met at Ellettsville, Sept. 28-29. Meetings were well attended. The brotherhood session had the largest attendance for years and the Y. P. U. meeting filled the house. The next meeting will be held at Central church, Ellettsville. To accommodate workers in the field the date has been changed to occupy one day and two nights.

FOR THREE YEARS Pastor S. J. Reid has received new members into Tabernacle church, Chicago, every month. On Sunday morning, Oct. 4, he gave the hand of fellowship to fourteen, and in the evening baptized three converts.

THE REVIVAL at Temple church, Chicago, conducted by Pastor J. H. Hughes and evangelist Kramer had resulted in twenty-seven additions to Sunday evening, Oct. 4. Since Pastor Hughes returned from his vacation three weeks ago he has welcomed thirty-five.

Lynn Gold Hough, Central M. E. church, Detroit; Rev. Wallace Petty, First Baptist church, Pittsburgh; Rev. David Brynnes, Trinity Baptist church, Minneapolis; and Pres. Bernard I. Bell of St. Stephens college.

FIFTY WOMEN, representing every New Jersey association, met for conference, Sept. 23-24, at the International seminary, East Orange. The study of current missionary study books, new methods of conducting programs, reading contests, etc., were discussed. Mrs. W. H. Farmer, state president, and Miss May Huston reviewed missionary books. Dr. and Mrs. F. A. Anderson, Dr. S. J. Beynon, Miss Lillian Eastman, who has been missionary in Burma for twenty-nine years, and Miss Edith Thomson took part in the program. Mrs. Farmer has directed this conference for four years. The results have been encouraging; many smaller churches have been interested and helped in forming missionary societies, while the missionary interest throughout the state has been increased.

REV. A. H. BAILEY, MRS. A. H. BAILEY AND ALFRED FRANCIS BAILEY OF SPOKANE, WASHINGTON

AT WHITTIER, CALIF., seventy-nine new members have been received into the church since Rev. John McFarlane took up the pastorate eight months ago. One member has offered a pipe organ to the church to cost $15,000 on condition that the rest of the members raise the $19,000 debt on the new church building. The church has unanimously voted to meet this challenge, and October is the time set to raise the $19,000. At the same time current expenses and missionary budgets will be subscribed.

DR. JOHNSTON MYERS of Chicago has been elected executive secretary of the local committee on arrangements for the next meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention, in Chicago, May 30-June 6, 1927. "Station WCOY" in this issue carries his initial announcement to the denomination. It is an unusual and challenging objective for the annual meeting.

BATES COLLEGE BEGAN its sixty-third year, Sept. 23, with the first chapel exercises. The principal feature was the matriculation address by Pres. C. D. Gray. The enrollment totals 644 students. New students number 197 and the committee on admissions was obliged to turn away many others. This is particularly true in the case of the young women of the freshman class, who were limited to sixty-five by vote of the trustees. More than twice that number of fully qualified candidates sent in applications.

FIRST CHURCH, Omaha, Neb., Dr. A. A. DeLarme, pastor, has secured Rev. George D. White of Virginia, Minn., as assistant pastor. He will also serve as director of young people's work and religious education. Mr. White was known as Minnesota's boy preacher before coming to Omaha, owing to his success in evangelistic work in the northwest. He is a young man of ability and an excellent preacher. The rapid growth of First church and the increased facilities and enlarged work made possible by the new Sunday-school building and parish house have made an additional pastor necessary.

A NEW DEPARTURE in religious education will be undertaken by the Philadelphia School of the Bible, which has begun the enrollment of students in the Air School of the Bible. The first lecture was broadcast from Station WRAX, Philadelphia, over a 268 meter wave length, at 8:45 p. m., Oct. 7, by Dean William L. Pettingill.

CHESTER H. LOUCKS, son of W. E. Loucks, pastor of the Albany Park church, Chicago, has accepted a call to St. Albans, Vt. He has been supplying at Battle Lake, Minn., since his graduation from Newton Theological institution last spring.

THIRTY-THREE PERSONS, twenty-four of whom were members of the First church, four from other Baptist churches and five candidates for baptism, form a new Baptist church organized in College View, Neb., Sept. 30. The first unit of a church building will be begun soon, as a choice lot valued at $5000 is now owned by the Lincoln Baptist Union. College View is a suburb of Lincoln, and the finest residence section of the city. Rev. Herbert Ford is acting for the Lincoln Baptist Union in getting the church started. The Sunday school is starting on a graded basis, and the church voted to support the denominational missionary and benevolent work.

The Aledo young people's missionary society, under Mrs. McNevin's direction, gave "The Talking Tree." The Aledo woman's society won the loving cup in the reading contest. Mrs. Charles Bromley of East China, and Rev. Newton Carman spoke. The annual sermon was preached by Dr. J. M. Jones, who succeeds Dr. G. A. Sheets as moderator. The young people held a stirring rally with Rev. G. E. Dawkins of Muscatine, Iowa, as speaker. Willard Johnson of Moline and Edward Daplene of Rock Island also gave addresses. Rock Island won the prize for the largest attendance, a scholarship to the assembly at Mt. Carroll.

THE 109TH ANNUAL MEETING of the Ashtabula Association was held with the First church, Geneva, Ohio, Sept. 29-30. The new social building lately erected for the Sunday school and other activities of

News Notes

Kaying Baptist high school in China deposes that it is time to stop calling our mission schools "no longer Christian schools," and the figures are given. Note them. The junior class has eighteen pupils, ten of them Christians; senior class, nine pupils, eight Christians; class just graduating, ten pupils, eight Christians; total students, thirty-seven, Christians, twenty-six. Rev. J. H. Griffin has directed the school for ten years. Mrs. Griffin recalls that ten years ago it was expected that in an effective mission school half of the students would be Christians. At Kaying two-thirds of them are Christians. The case seems to be proved; it is still a Christian school, increasingly so.

Two new fields in Porto Rico have become self-supporting. On July 1, the Santurce church called its own pastor and obligated itself to provide for his support. Beginning the first of September the church of Carolina with a neighboring rural church took the same step. Previous to this there had been two other self-supporting churches in Porto Rico; the one in Caguas which attained its independence six years ago after about fifteen years of growth and the country church of Cienaga Alta which was born standing on its own feet. The steady growth in self-support of the churches in Porto Rico in the midst of desperate poverty and difficult economic situations is a great achievement. The outstanding need in Porto Rico is for an adequate church building for the thriving and heroic church of Santurce. It is sad that a church which sustains such a large Sunday-school, meeting in three different houses at the same time, which long ago outgrew its original structure, and which has attained to self-support, cannot have a building in which to carry on its ministry, whose fruitfulness has been so fully demonstrated.

Press dispatches are keeping the American public advised of the principal developments in the political situation in China which changes rapidly. In recent weeks foreign missionaries in several sections of China have been subjected to personal danger and considerable embarrassment through the movements of the armies and the attacks of bandits. Thus far most of the missionaries of our societies have escaped serious danger, and at most of our stations conditions are peaceful. However, the situation in several sections is regarded as serious, especially in Szechuan province (West China), although by cable we have learned that the missionaries there are "safe and well." Without question, this is a time when the souls of many missionaries in China are being tested, and we admire the courage with which they are facing the disturbances of the present and the uncertainty of the future. At this time we should give them our most sympathetic, affectionate and prayerful regard.—JAMES H. FRANKLIN, foreign secretary, American Baptist Foreign Mission Society.

The basement contains modern Sunday-school equipment, primary rooms, coat rooms, lavatories, a parlor room for the men, a modern kitchen and eight classrooms. Two new heating plants, one for hot water and the other for steam have been installed. A lobby, opening from two towers into the auditorium, gives a central entrance. The hardwood floors with velvet runners, the lighting system, and the reseating of the pews, together with newly decorated walls have made a new place of the auditorium. The church is installing memorial windows.

REV. R. W. BABCOCK, pastor of the Temple church, Minneapolis, was called to Elgin, Ill., Sept. 29, by the death of his mother, Mrs. E. D. Babcock. Doctor Tunison, pastor of the Elgin church had charge of the funeral service.

BAPTISTS of MINNEAPOLIS are in the midst of a building campaign. The University church hopes to complete its $100,000 fund for completing its auditorium. Judson Memorial church is raising $50,000 to build the auditorium that will complete the present building.

FOUNDED IN 1866, CARLETON COLLEGE, Northfield, Minn., has had a steady growth through fifty-nine years. It entered its sixtieth year, Sept. 14, when students representing seven foreign countries and twenty-three states matriculated. Twenty-two denominations are represented. Baptists rank sixth in number, being exceeded by Congregationalists, Episcopalians, Methodists, Presbyterians, and Lutherans. These six denominations take in all but eighty-seven of the 815 students registered. Carleton is the only Baptist college in Minnesota. Baptists have joined with Congregationalists and Episcopalians in the support of this institution. The three cooperating denominations furnish 404 students, about half of the number enrolled.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel bldg., Chicago.

"Good evening, radio fans. We have a peppy young man waiting here ready to greet you. He is no other than Johnston Myers, ten years pastor of the Ninth Street church of Cincinnati, Ohio, and for the past thirty-one years, pastor of the Immanuel church, here in Chicago. Tune in carefully. Put on the loud speaker so that the whole family can hear this unusual announcement. This is Doctor Myers:

'Glad to speak to WCOY tonight. Anything backed by THE BAPTIST goes with me. When the postman hands me the mail with the paper in the bunch I take it up first to get the news of the Baptist folk I've known. The paper is full of surprises. There are the items showing gains, losses, sacrifices, victories and home- goings of those I have loved. For each item I have my own silent comment. When a man has been in the heat of the battle for forty-one years he knows a lot of the soldiers and their officers. I am sending you greetings tonight. I am having a new, and in some ways, the greatest, experience of my life.

'After the Northern Baptist Convention meeting in Washington last May, five of the leaders of our work on the Pacific coast called on me. During our conference one of them said: "Why not make the next meeting of the convention in Chicago, 1927, the greatest gathering of Baptists that has ever been held in the history of the denomination?" This suggestion bored into my mind. I couldn't forget it. I began to talk to our secretaries. The time seemed ripe for a tremendous event. How it would thrill everybody! How it would advance the kingdom! Surely it was worth striving for!

'When the Chicago committee on arrangements for the next meeting met, it elected me executive secretary. It asked me to raise the budget for the local expenses. It adopted a goal for attendance at 20,000 delegates and visitors. I am instructed to make my plans for this number. President Brouger has wired from California that we ought to make the goal 25,000. Is that too high? IT IS NOT! WE CAN MAKE IT AND WE WILL!

'Every one who has heard the goal presented has been thrilled by it. Here is an opportunity for a touchdown never dreamed possible. We want your help. I am ready to spend all my time in the field working up the necessary plans. Help me create the pep to carry them over. I shall be speaking in state conventions, associations, and conferences of all sorts every week. Do you want me to come to your state? All right! Invite me. I have the story right here under my hat. It's a thriller. Let me tell your people about it.

'This is going to be one of the great high-water marks of Baptist history. You will never forgive yourself if you miss the opportunity to help put it across. Light up your torch right now and set out to kindle enthusiasm for the greatest Baptist love feast of all time. Remember the dates—MAY 30-JUNE 6, 1927. Reserve these dates tonight. We shall plan to entertain more Baptists that week than ever met in one place. Will you be one of them?

'Now the best thing you can do is to watch THE BAPTIST for developments. I have my office right here in the Immanuel building. THE BAPTIST is our paper and the editors are going to see that all the news about this great convention will be given prominent place. They want me to succeed on this job. They are all going to help me. Pass your copy of the paper around. Get others to subscribe for it. No item of progress will fail to appear in its columns. I thank you all for listening to my little stunt tonight. But this is about the biggest job I ever tackled in my life. I want you all to help me. Good-night.'

This business of enforcing the law takes some queer turns. Brigadier-General Lincoln C. Andrews, assistant secretary of the treasury, in a statement, Sept. 22, declared that the prohibition enforcement personnel, with the exception of those who buy and drink liquor in the course of gathering evidence, must be total abstainers. Two items in that report arrest attention. The first is that any but total abstainers should ever have been enlisted in the prohibition enforcement personnel; the second, that in a certain branch of that service it is necessary to employ boozers. Neither item can be tolerated as a finality.

"Something is lacking in preaching and in worship, in corporate life and social service which nothing but a revival will bestow," declares Rev. George H. Morrison. "The church is not clothed with heavenly power. It is distracted, weak, often ineffectual. It is not fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners. But the time is coming, and is nearer than we think for, when the church shall recapture its authority, 'not by might and not by power, but by my spirit,' saith the Lord. Let modernists cease to sneer at fundamentalists, and fundamentalists to look askance at modernists—let all who believe in God through Jesus Christ unite in a deep and general expectancy, and, sooner than we dream of, the windows of heaven will be opened, and the evangel be with power again. Stressing our unities and not our differences—our oneness in things that really matter—not hindering the times of heaven by antagonisms, but hastening them by the love that thinks no evil, fathers and brethren, earlier than Bishop Edgar Blake paints a dark picture for Protestantism in Europe. He says: "European Protestantism is in a weaker condition today than at any time for two centuries. At the very hour when the conditions demand that the churches should be at the full tide of their strength, the Protestant forces are depleted in spirit and resources beyond any point since the early days of the reformation. . . . It is doubtful if any great branch of the church was ever reduced to such a pitiable plight as the Russian Orthodox church finds itself in at the present time. It is weaker today than at any period since Christianity was introduced into Russia ten centuries ago. The situation of the orthodox churches of southeastern Europe is not

The Northern Baptist Theological seminary, Chicago, announces through Pres. Geo. W. Taft that Rev. William Law Ferguson, D.D., of Madras, India, has accepted a call to become dean of the pastors' college and professor of English Bible. He will begin his work with the seminary next September. In the meantime Doctor Ferguson is completing thirty years of service in India as an honored and successful missionary of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. Graduating from Des Moines university in 1892 and from Rochester Theological seminary in '95, Doctor Ferguson went to India where he became president of the theological seminary at Ramapatam. After several years in educational work and in administrative service for the Foreign Society, he was transferred to the city of Madras where he has labored for nearly twenty years among the high caste Brahman students of the University of Madras. By temperament, training and experience Doctor Ferguson is well fitted for the important place to which he has been unanimously and enthusiastically called. It is a great wrench for him to break the ties which bind him to India, but compelling circumstances make it imperative. The pastors' college of which he will become the dean is in reality the child of the Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention. Its function is to provide a two-year English course for students preparing for the gospel ministry and its work is closely articulated with the work of the seminary. This department, or college as it is called, is supported in part by the Board of Education.

Notes on the Lesson for October 24

JOSHUA, ISRAEL'S NEW LEADER

Lesson Text: Num. 27:18-20; Josh. 1:1-9. Golden Text: Josh. 1:9

"God buries the workers, but carries on the work," is the inscription on the tablet in Westminster Abbey which bears the portraits of John and Charles Wesley.

The Living God

"Jehovah said unto Moses," is the word which opens the lesson. Those men seemed to walk so near to God that they could hear his voice. Of course Moses was concerned about his successor. He had thought about it for a long time. He had considered various men, but one seemed to stand out from all the others as the most likely man to carry on the great work which Moses had begun, Joshua. Everything pointed to Joshua as the next great leader of the Israelites. How natural then that Moses should hear the voice of Jehovah in every evidence for his choice of Joshua as his successor! But Joshua himself was not to be left listening to the echoes of Jehovah's word to Moses. "For it came to pass after the death of Moses that Jehovah spake unto Joshua." In those days God was a speaking Jehovah whose word was current with the progress of events. He had a message for Joshua which was timely and in that message Joshua found his commission and authority. So it runs all through the Old Testament. The living God spoke to each succeeding generation with a word peculiarly applicable to the situation and every true prophet was but the voice of God, because the prophet had the vision and courage to interpret the times in the light of the eternal truth. It was a sad day when the speaking Jehovah became silent and when each succeeding generation thereafter was confined to the phonograph record of his voice spoken through prophets and apostles. The Bible is a wonderful and inimitable record of God's word; but is it not to be regretted that so many people believe that God ceased speaking sometime during the first century of the Christian era? One cannot help wishing that we might return to the good old days when Jehovah spake to Joshua.

The Living Man

The living God works through living men. The courage of Joshua was essential to the conquest of Canaan. Obedience to the will of God was the condition of success. The people were to possess only what they actually experienced. "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon." There was to be no absentee ownership, no possession by inheritance. The living God will make men live and grow by conquest. If the word of God is current today it is current only to men and women who have the courage to venture forward into new territory where a fresh word from God is necessary. "God is not the God of the dead, but the God of the living." The living God speaks and works through living men.

Broken Lights, by Harold Begbie. New York: Doran. $1.50.

In a short study in the varieties of Christian opinion analyzing the differences and the agreements of some of the modern Christian sects, the noted author "Twice Born Men," Doctor Begbie, gives us the leading contentions of the more important factions or schools of thought. He believes that each has contribution to make that is worth while it can be fairly presented. The chief value of the book lies in the fact that the author has set forth not only the matters that divide but has carefully portrayed the great underlying principles upon which nearly all of these various factions are in a way united.

Searchlights from the Word, by Dr. G. Campbell Morgan. New York: Revell. $3.75.

"Every page of the Sacred Writings," says Doctor Morgan, "has many thoughts which stretch out like long, clean arms of light across the darkness, discovering us things which otherwise were hidden and having application wider than those of the immediate context."

With his characteristic analytical insight Doctor Morgan goes through the entire scriptures treating each of the 138 chapters from the above point of view. He gives at the head of each chapter discourse what he considers the key verse of that chapter, and in a few direct and forceful statements portrays the great lines of thought that are touched upon directly or indirectly in the chapter. He gives careful emphasis to those passages that show the line of thought related to that which has been recorded before and also to those lines of thought which follow. This is not a book of sermons or sermon outlines but an arrangement of the great far-reaching thoughts that are contained in the Bible and should prove a ready help to all who are endeavoring to read their Bibles intelligently.

Kennedy's Second Best, by John D. Freeman. New York: Revell. $2 net.

A story of the great Northwest, laid in Alberta. The primary character is a young minister who goes there for a vacation, meets a tragedy in a love affair, spends a year on a cattle ranch and then, after solving his matrimonial problem, resumes the call of the largest church in one of the eastern provinces that he may return to the plains as a missionary to the homesteaders in the great reaches along the Rockies. The problem hinges on the old question of how far a man is justified in giving up position, large income and influence, to do what seems like a secondary type of service. Kennedy disappoints all his friends, his relatives and his young wife in his choice. Did he follow Jesus of Nazareth? His faith that he did glorifies his second best.

The Second Century of Baptist Foreign Missions, by William B. Lipphard. Philadelphia: Judson Press. $1.

While the Northern Baptist Convention sat in Boston in 1914, celebrating the first 100 years of Baptist missions, world events were hurrying to the climax that ushered in the "Second Century of Baptist Foreign Missions" which this book records to date. It is the story of Baptist foreign missions in and since the great war. Doctor Lipphard has been a member of the foreign board during all these years; he has traveled through all our foreign mission fields. He acted as special representative of the foreign board in dispensing relief to Europe's needy millions following the armistice.

In four of the eight chapters, Doctor Lipphard deals with the blasting of our missionary program by war, its readjustment and final rebuilding. Out of war necessities grows a new indigenous Christianity. World missions more and more merges into the gigantic world problems around us. Two problems stand supreme: financing the project, and keeping the spiritual emphasis first. A fine book for our Baptist men.

This volume is a scientific survey of organized religion in Springfield, Mass., conducted by the Institute of Social and Religious Research with Paul H. Douglass as field director. The general purpose was "to make a direct study of objective conditions, primarily in the field of organized religion, but with as broad a social background as possible." All faiths were asked to participate. The book presents the results of an intensive

BIBLE DRAMAS in the PULPIT

By PERRY J. STACKHOUSE, D.D.

Pastor, First Baptist Church, Chicago

Doctor Stackhouse aims at recovery of dramatic power by the modern preacher—not to turn the pulpiteer into an actor, but to let religious fact be felt with telling dramatic force as the Bible itself conveys it. To this end he has given here eleven Bible stories, in the language of the Scripture for the most part, but cast in the form of the drama.

study covering a period of ten months. It demonstrates the new method of arriving at facts with reference to church work.

The book gives a brief sketch of the development of Springfield; its geographic situation, its population, its denominational churches and the type of work they are attempting to do. It makes a careful study of the growth and service of the churches to the community, their success and failures, their problems and projects. The problems and conditions and opportunities of the churches of Springfield are akin to those which most of the urban churches are facing. This survey will be a valuable contribution to the solution of problems and the formulation of programs adequate to meet the needs of our American cities. This survey does not present programs, but studies existing conditions and gives the facts upon which programs can be built.

My Gray Gull, by William Valentine Kelley. New York: The Abingdon Press. $1.50.

This is a volume of essays written out of the rich and mature experience of one who sees beneath the surface. The first essay gives title to the book and is followed by eight other essays equally good. There is no effort at unity in the selection of the material. The author sought uniformity of quality rather than unity of subject matter. He tells us in the foreword that this volume contains "the matured conclusions and convictions of a long, studious, sedulous and deliberating life, listening to all voices, hearing all sides, impressed most with the purblind crass credulity of unbelief."

—JOHN A. EARL.

An Outline of the History of Christian Literature, by George L. Hurst. New York: Macmillan. $4.

Readers of Newman's "History of Christianity" will remember what a valuable help to an understanding of the mind of Christendom from period to period is supplied by the sections giving a brief survey of the literature of each period. Something of the same sort is done in the volume here considered, but it is done more elaborately and perhaps in a more luminous treatment. The work is a cyclopedia of Christian literature put in a beautifully historical form. It is logical, chronological, rhetorical, vital, accurate. Wherever the reader opens a page he almost sees the picture of some live, human maker of thought and actions in some of the Christian centuries. They talk to you, smile at you, weep before you, challenge you, rebuke you, comfort you. Brief personal sketch, discriminating characterization and apt quotation flow on through the book from beginning to end, and the index of writers at the close completes a fascinating and valuable treatise for the bookshelf of the student, teacher, pastor or anybody else who is intelligently interested in the course of Christian thought and life through all the Christian centuries.

Cyclopedia of Funeral Sermons and Sketches, by Rev. G. B. F. Hallock. New York: Doran.

Compiled by an author out of forty years of busy pastoral experience, it is full of suggestions, quotable poetry, illustrations, texts, sermon topics, outlines, prayers, forms of committal, benedictions, etc., for the exacting duty of the pastor in ministering to those in bereavement. Many of the world's richest gems are contained in the poetry and illustrations.

—FRED H. FAHRINGER.

Modern Missions in Chile and Brazil, by W. Reginald Wheeler, Robert G. McGregor, Maria McIlvane Gillmore, Ann Townsend Reid and Robert E. Speer. Philadelphia: The Westminster Press. $2.50.

A Presbyterian with this book in his hands ought to feel a thrill of pride and gratitude to God. It is done as Presbyterians do everything, even quarreling over theology, thoroughly and to a finish. It takes the reader upon a tour of the field, with well-traced maps and pictures. It shows the country, describes the people and customs, tells the story of Presbyterian work on that field, portrays the struggle against intolerance, exhibits the triumphs of evangelical faith, and presents as a trophy a self-controlled, self-supporting and self-propagating Presbyterian church of 30,000 communicants. Withal, it is thoroughly readable, it is illuminated by such incidents as serve to give an unusually clear insight into the present conditions in Latin America and into the historical background of those conditions.

—U. M. McGUIRE.

The Unfinished Task of Foreign Missions, by Robert E. Speer. New York: Revell. $2.75.

Doctor Speer surveys the world task of foreign missions in answer to a worldwide query as to whether foreign missions "riddled with weakness, with elements of dissatisfaction, and with real occasions for discontent" should not be abandoned. He returns from South America, India and China, having faced all the facts and conditions. He is still for foreign missions "simply upon the solid conviction that we are working with righteousness, with truth and with God."

His chapters on "Economic and Religious Environment of Missions in India," "The Christian Approach to Buddhism," "The Most Open Door to Islam," and "The Present Situation in South America" are replete with first-hand evidence to show how the great religions of the world are crumbling, and how Christianity, the religion of the Spirit, can, and is, filling the gap. Thirty years have practically nullified all opposition to Christianity around the world where proper approach is made.

The heart and body hunger of untouched millions makes the task appalling. "The force which is to meet the needs of the world is not in the keeping of any government to wield. . . . It was God's good pleasure through the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe."

This is without doubt the most complete and masterly restudy of world missions since the great war. It thrills the soul and gives fresh courage to those who fight behind the lines to win the world for Christ.

—W. F. HUXFORD.

Principles and Technique in Religious Dramatics, by Elizabeth Edland. Chicago: The Methodist Book Concern. 60 and 65 cents.

Miss Edland goes into the philosophy of dramatic delineation but gives hints and helps in every part of the work. The religious drama is to her as to others the basis of all histrionic representation. In ten studious chapters, teachers and pupils are given a veritable curriculum in the use of the scripture play and pageant. Many will wish to avail themselves of the terse directions here given.

—J. W. WEDDELL.

The Glorious Names of Jesus, by Amos R. Wells. New York: Revell. 60 cents.

Out of an incomplete list of forty-six titles of Jesus, the author selects fourteen which are the most beautiful, exalted, reverential names applied to the Master. The chapters are short, revealing the character of Jesus from many different angles. As the reader meditates upon such chapters as "The Saviour," "The Author and Finisher of Our Faith," "The Alpha and the Omega," "The Lion of the Tribe of Judah," "The Dayspring," "The Lamb of God," "The Truth," "The Christ," he is drawn closer to his Lord and Master. The book abounds in stimulating sermon material.

—F. H. FAHRINGER.

The Spell of the Caribbean Islands, by Archie Bell. Boston: Page. $3.75 net.

A story of a cruise in that eternal summerland of the outer fringe of islands that stretches like the crescent of the new moon from Porto Rico to South America. Among these volcanic bits of earth born of titanic convulsions, such as that of Pelee which in 1902 wiped out a city in one breath, Columbus sailed his caravels and named them. These tiny specks on the southern sea have histories going back over 400 years. Here savage Carib, Spanish, French, Dutch and English, Creole and negro have played their parts in the drama of the centuries. Conquest, exploitation, piracy, colonization, slavery, rebellion, and romance have touched every island. The author cruises about the archipelago, stopping here and there, and takes the reader with him in a thrilling narrative of the varied life. But the thrill of the book lies in the story of cruising along the palm-fringed shores of islands set in an azure sea. One of these dots gave France an empress. On another was the first British colony in the world. At another, the stars and stripes were first saluted by a foreign nation. Trips to Lilliput or Brobdingnag could scarcely be more charming. The volume is handsomely bound, embossed in gold and colors and is illustrated with full-page half-tones.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

At the Euclid Avenue church, Cleveland, Ohio, on Nov. 3-5 will be held the eighth annual assembly of the International Association of Women Preachers. Reservations are to be made at the new Amsterdam hotel which is near the church. Cleveland is the home of the vice-president, Rev. Mary A. Lyons. An excellent program is being planned with Judge Florence Allen of the Ohio federal court as one of the speakers.

Readers who have been thinking of the Searchlight, published by Frank L. Norris and W. B. Riley, as a Baptist paper and an organ of the Baptist Bible Union, will be interested to read the announcement of Mr. J. M. Gillam, its business manager, that "the Searchlight is not and never has been, a denominational paper." Its announcement seeks the support of "all denominations" on the ground that it "proclaims the fundamental principles" held by them in common.

Both Boston and Chicago forums will run a full season this year, the former at Ford hall, with Mr. George Coleman in charge; the latter at Erlanger theater, with Fred Moore in charge. Interpreting the forum idea, Mr. Coleman says the forum stands for the complete development of democracy in America; a common meeting-ground for all the people in the interest of truth and mutual understanding, and for the cultivation of community spirit; the fullest and freest open public discussion of all vital questions affecting human welfare; for free participation from the forum floor either by questions or discussion; the freedom of forum management from responsibility for utterances by speakers from the platform or the floor.

Kentucky is not alone in trying to solve the problem of Baptist schools. A committee of the Kentucky General Association of Baptists is working on a plan to anchor the Baptist schools of Kentucky to the denomination. But Rev. C. W. Boone, a member of the committee, in the Western Recorder raises what he calls a larger question, thus: "How are we going to keep our schools alive? Suppose we do get them 'anchored,' and their denominational ownership and control established beyond controversy, and then they all have to close their doors because of lack of financial support—where shall we be then? While we have debated the question of the method of controlling the schools and have clamored for a more rigid supervision of their teaching and work, we have lost sight of the fact that we may lose the schools altogether." It is a bit like the story about two men who quarreled over the ownership of a horse until they let him starve to death.

Philip Mauro, a staunch defender of the faith as interpreted by conservatives in theology, and the author of a number of religious books bearing upon the interpretation of the Bible, lectured recently in Boston. He is an attorney and a member of the law firm of Mauro, Cameron, Lewis and Kerken, Washington, D. C. His success as a lawyer was carried over into his Christian life when he was converted in 1903, and he has been an active and aggressive lawyer-preacher ever since. He applies the logic of the legal profession to the defense of Christianity and both his preaching and writing reveal the rare gift of clarity.

The Herald of Gospel Liberty finds THE BAPTIST at fault again. THE BAPTIST pointed out as a matter of logic that if tithing is a matter of universal obligation in regard to ratio of giving, the object to which it is applied ought to be equally definite and obligatory. The Herald thinks otherwise. It argues that the ratio is obligatory but the object is optional. It understands THE BAPTIST to hold that both the ratio and the object are fixed and that the law of the tithe requires that a tenth of one's income ought to be given to the church to be distributed as the church shall order. Quite the contrary. The logic should work the other way. The option as to ratio and object alike is with the individual. There is something at once larger and freer than any possible doctrine of tithing. It is Christian stewardship.

Prof. Gustav Kruger of the University of Giessen, Germany, after spending the spring quarter teaching in the divinity school of the University of Chicago, left for his home some time in July. Before leaving he delivered a farewell address to the faculty and students which appears in full in the August number of the Divinity Student. Among other good things which Professor Kruger said in his farewell address this gem appears: "In Europe you can often hear it said that in America the dollar is ruling. I do not doubt at all but that is true. But I cannot see that such a rule of mammon is something peculiar to America. The dance about the golden calf was even in Moses' time the most important of all dances, and in that there has been little change. The trouble is that the calf is not everywhere as massively golden as in America."

Harry Emerson Fosdick revealed the deep significance of the new ministry upon which he has entered as pastor of the Park Avenue church, New York, when he gave a brief preliminary address before preaching his first sermon Oct. 3. He said in part: "We are entering here upon an important adventure in religion. Many things that traditionally have clustered like barnacles about religion we are not interested in. But in religion itself, revealed in the spirit of Jesus as a vital, saving and sustaining power in human experience, we are so deeply interested that here in New York, which some ministers are leaving because it seems hopeless, and other ministers are refusing to come to because it seems obdurate and hard, we are proposing to erect a fresh and high standard of non-sectarian Christianity. It is not what I say in this pulpit that will make Christ's interpretation of life's meaning glow and sing, alluring and challenging the consciences of men; it is the kind of character that we produce in the fellowship of this church. Therefore I adjure you, do not be easy on me as your minister. Hold me up to high standards. Here in America, so prosperous and self-complacent, it is going to be easy this next generation to preach respectability, but to preach real Christianity that searches personal life and social relationships, will be hard. Hold me to it. And as I ask you not to be easy on me, I ask you also not to expect me to be easy on you. I shall proclaim here no diluted Christianity harmonious with popular prejudices, but just as piercing and penetrating a gospel as I can compass, which I hope will disturb your consciences, as it disturbs mine, about the quality of life which we live in business, in society, in the nation and in private character."

No doubts that Asiatic peoples migrated to North America via the Alaskan peninsula can longer be entertained in the opinion of Dr. Ales Hrdlicka, Smithsonian anthropologist.

The department of agriculture has announced results of experiments this season in dusting trees with arsenate of lead from an airplane as a control measure against the spread of gypsy moths. Practically no larval parasites were found after the treatment on heavily infested forests.

Regularly fortnightly air-mail service has been improved over the all-British route from Bagdad to Rutbah Vells, across Transjordan to Amman east of Jerusalem, thence direct to Cairo, via Zia, the Dead sea, Beersheba, and Gaza, landing at Al Maza, a suburb of Cairo. Commercial lines from Cairo to Karachi (India) via Bagdad, and from Bagdad to Brindisi, Italy, are planned by the coming year.

A dream of the Chinese Christians of Chicago is about to become a reality. For many years the Chinese church has labored on its work in inadequate rented quarters. Now, with the sympathy and active cooperation of the comity commission of the Chicago church federation, property has been purchased as a permanent home for the Chinese church. The Chinese people themselves have already secured approximately $7000 and evangelical denominations have promised as much more.

At a recent meeting of the religious education vocational workers of Texas, the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Sept. 7-9, there were sixty bona fide full-time educational workers present. These came from every section of the state, from Texarkana to El Paso and from Amarillo to Galveston. In addition to the full-time paid workers, thirty part-time workers attended the conference and about thirty interested laymen and laywomen were present throughout the three days' session. So far as is known this was the largest group ever assembled in this field.

"The wisest and best educational evangelism can never do away with the necessity for choice; but in the proportion as it is wise, it will make a thorough-going choice of Jesus easy and natural and attractive instead of difficult and unnatural and unattractive," declares the California Christian Advocate. "It is because of this fact that there is a place for exhortation. After the teaching comes a psychological moment when, a boost to the soul, may be helpful. Salesmen know that a good salesman who concerns it and meets it with the salesman's substitute for exhortation. The purpose to make the seeker recognize the spiritual fact of choice does him a wrong. It must be made to see by evangelism, education, or by that combination which we call educational evangelism, that when all has been done for him that can be done, he must in the very sweat and agony of his soul choose or lose."

Something different has taken place in Illinois politics. In consideration of the existing political conditions in that state, a meeting held in Chicago of citizens from different sections sent a petition to the International Council of Religious Education to release its general secretary, Dr. Hugh S. Magill, temporarily that he might run as an independent candidate for the office of United States senator. The council granted the request without affecting his official relation to the organization.

No finer knight-errantry ever appeared in history than that displayed in our own times on the mission fields. Take the case of Rev. and Mrs. A. F. Groesbeck at Chaoyanghsien, China. With hearts heavy and anxious for their children across the sea and in growing peril every hour they stay. Speaking for both in a letter to THE BAPTIST Mr. Groesbeck writes: "We have hardly experienced 'the beginning of sorrows' out here. Any faint-heart had better turn back while the going remains good. Pulpits and professorships (in America) have absolutely no attraction for me. I would rather be out here where the greatest movements of all time are beginning, movements that are as certain to make the world over as is certain the setting of tonight's sun. I would rather be an observer out here than live at ease in America. And I haven't forgotten that I have a boy and a girl, both of whom need me, in America, while I am writing this declaration."

The Witter Bynner prize for the best poem written by an undergraduate in an American university was recently awarded to Langston Hughes, a colored student at Harvard university. In 1925, Countee Cullen, another negro student, won the coveted award. The annual entries in this contest run into the thousands and represent practically every college and university in the country.

The next meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention will be held in Chicago, Ill., May 30-June 5, 1927. It was necessary for the local committee of arrangements to fix upon these dates in order to secure the coliseum. The next meeting of the executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention will be held in Chicago Nov. 18.—Madeline Jutzi, secretary to Doctor Bitting.

A Japanese summer vacation school was held in Scott hall, Tokyo. Scott hall was a gift of Mrs. John E. Scott of Pasadena, Calif., as a memorial to her husband, John E. Scott. It is located near Waseda university, and is a center for student work. During the summer several of the Christian students give three weeks of their vacation to this school, organized for the children of the neighborhood. The leader of the school is Mr. K. Fujii, M.A., Pennsylvania, and a former student of Ottawa university and Crozer.

The religious tract is not nearly so much in evidence as it was years ago. The multiplication of religious books, magazines and newspapers and the reasonable price at which they are sold has reduced the number and variety of religious tracts published to a great degree. But now and then we find a tract of real merit. "What Baptists Believe," by J. Sherman Wallace, published by the American Baptist Publication Society, is such a tract. After stating the things Baptists hold in common with other evangelical bodies the tract goes on to give eight points of Baptist emphasis covering the gospel, salvation, the church, the ordinances, religious liberty, church and state, spiritualized democracy, and the supreme worth of the individual. In communities where the Baptist position is misunderstood the distribution of a tract like this one would make for intelligence.

The West Roxbury Association met in the Brookline, Mass., church Oct. 6. The program embraced morning, afternoon and evening sessions. Morning addresses on "Six Months of Intensive Evangelism in the Churches of the Boston West Association," were given by Rev. Frederick E. Heath, Jamaica Plain, and Rev. E. L. Loomis, South Boston. Rev. Raymond W. Cooper spoke on "Scriptural Evangelism." Clyde W. Robbins, Roslindale, was heard on "The Spiritual Inventory of the Boston West Association." "Evangelism at Home and Abroad," was discussed as follows: "In the Highways and Byways of Our City," Rev. A. A. Forshee, secretary of the city mission society; "Evangelism in Massachusetts," Rev. Hugh A. Heath, state secretary; "Medical Evangelism," George A. Huntley, M. D., of China; "Christianity at Work in Cuba," Miss Elizabeth M. Allport, of Cuba. "The Meaning of Conversion" was the theme of Prof. Richard H. Vaughan, Newton Theological institution. The feature of the evening session was an address by Rev. Chester J. Underhill, "the fighting parson," of Lynn, on "The Management of a Modern Church."

The many friends of ex-president Geo. E. Horr of Newton Theological institution, New Center, Mass., will be happy to learn that after a long seige of illness and a surgical experience in a hospital in Newark, N. J., he has returned to the home of his brother in Needham, Mass. Doctor Horr is known and loved by hundreds of Baptist ministers all over the world who were inspired by his rich and gracious personality while receiving their theological training in Newton Center under the beneficent shade of the giant trees which beautify the hilltop on which the seminary stands.

W. A. Cameron, pastor of Bloor Street church, Toronto, Canada, cordially invited to visit the Temple church, Los Angeles, Calif., felt compelled to decline the proffered hospitality of that great church. The old building in which the Bloor Street congregation has worked and worshiped so long has been sold and work already is begun on the new church. Doctor Cameron is a great spiritual force in Toronto and his ministry is sought after in the United States and across the seas. But his heart is in his native country. Last summer he was the fraternal delegate preacher from North America before the British Baptist Union which met at Leeds, England. Doubtless when the Baptist World Alliance meets in Toronto in 1928 we shall find among the prominent men who will make of that meeting the most far-reaching and significant event in Baptist history the popular pastor of the Bloor Street church.

If international good-will is not accelerated it will not be the fault of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches. A great program has been prepared for the International Good-Will Congress to be held in Pittsburgh, Pa., Nov. 10-12, 1926. The central themes of the congress will be "The Moral Issues of Disarmament" and "America's Responsibility and Method for International Cooperation." On the program appear the names of men and women high in the leadership of the moral and spiritual forces of the world. Such names as Raymond Robbins, Stephen S. Wise, S. Parkes Cadman, James John Keane, William Allen White, John R. Mott, and Miss Lucy Gardner guarantee the real value of the congress. The great public mass meeting to be held in the Syria Mosque will be addressed by three outstanding representatives of Protestants, Catholics and Jews.

Arkansas Baptists owe on all of their institutions and interests belonging to the denomination within the state nearly a million dollars, and they are not worrying over the situation, for they say they are perfectly solvent with a credit good for three millions at the bank. Happy Arkansas!

Something appearing in THE BAPTIST has moved the Baptist Record of Mississippi to say: "THE BAPTIST of Chicago, both editor and associate editor being spokesmen, is constantly proclaiming its opposition to war, condemning military and naval appropriations or preparation, encouraging those who insist that they will in no circumstances go to war." What are the facts? We have referred to the subject occasionally. In the words of the Record, and in full agreement with its own expressed opinion, "We are against war as a way of settling disputes." We are opposed to every tendency to commit this nation to imperialistic militarism. We have pointed out such tendencies in connection with the demand often made for such an armament that all nations will fear the United States. We have welcomed all movements that aim at peace. We have said that while out and out pacifism is futile as a remedy for the evils of war, it may have some beneficial effect as a protest. We have said that the way to end war is to organize internationally for peace with justice under law.

The Holy Spirit in Evangelism

ORGANIZATION, methods, conditions, doctrines, magnetic personality, crowd psychology, skill, common sense, all have their place in relation to effective evangelism. But beyond all of them together is the power of the Holy Spirit.

So much is mere memorandum. Both understanding and acceptance of it on the part of the reader are assumed. Our readers have Bibles. They know how to read them. They are able to trace therein the abundant landmarks of the teaching of the Holy Spirit. Many of them can approach the subject with the background of a personal experience that carries to them in the very mention of the Holy Spirit a sense of the presence of God. If all of us could do so, the experience would mean a great enrichment of personal living and of Christian communion.

Experience of the Spirit and not merely the doctrine of the Spirit is here emphasized. To know the doctrine is good and desirable, but men may dispute about the Spirit and God in the spirit of Satan. We know only in part. Every genuine Christian has much more than he can define. Names muster in companies and labor with united means to convey only in part the reality. Holy Spirit, Spirit of God, the eternal Spirit, Spirit of truth, Spirit of grace and glory, Comforter, Spirit of Christ, are all one and the one Spirit, and all that these names mean is conveyed in the promise of Jesus to his followers. Let each believer expect that name of the Spirit which throws out to him the rarest gleam of meaning and seek to realize within himself its full content of living. In it he will find all.

A set of the mind against mysticism and the fear of emotional extravagances restrain many from the full appropriation of spiritual power. They shy at what men, for lack of an adequate vocabulary, call the supernatural. They forget that the supernatural is the natural seen through to its ultimate reality. The universe is the brood of the Spirit of God, as the spirits of men ought to be.

He is the resident Creator. If this seems obscure, look at Jesus. God was in him. His Spirit is the Spirit of God. Does it seem either mystical or fanatical for a Christian to look at life as he did, to adopt his scale of values, to enter into his fellowship with God, to believe as he believed, to trust as he trusted, to feel the urge of love that impelled him, to hope his hope, and to share in his calm self-dedication? Does it seem incredible that out of his triumphant life shall flow into those who seek to share it a full tide of personal reenforcement along all of those channels? But that is what the gift of the Holy Spirit means. Significantly, Jesus breathed on the disciples and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit." His Spirit is the native atmosphere of the gospel, free, vitalizing, available.

Of course there is danger of a mystical fanaticism. It seems to hang on the borders of every great revival movement. Such fanaticism comes not from an excessive manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, but from abnormal psychological reactions in religiously misguided folk. There can be no excess of the Spirit that Jesus possessed, for balanced intensity was one of his most distinctive character marks. Fanaticism exhibits intensity without balance. The corresponding error and danger is that of inert balance without intensity. The reign of the Spirit of God is the safeguard against both. He never creates fanaticism or inertia; he creates Christliness.

Seek efficiency rather than ecstasy. The value of the spiritual endowment lies less in the way it makes one feel, than in what it does through one's testimony to others. Glory may flood one's soul, but most of the actual and effective witnessing for Christ is done by Christians whose souls are not at the moment flooded with glory. Paul fell into an occasional trance, but his great evangelistic successes were not achieved by a man in a trance. He was most fit for his work when he was most perfectly himself with all of his powers spiritually coordinated at their best.

One's spiritual radiance may properly be more manifest to others than to himself, like Moses' shining face.

The Holy Spirit is to be received through faith, as Jesus is. Nobody has to persuade Jesus to save him or to persuade the Spirit to come. The man with a hungry soul may well release his longing in prayer, but already far in advance of his petition is a Christly and spiritual appeal on his behalf lodged in the bosom of the Father and mobilizing divine resources for an answer. He who believes in the invisible presence and sufficiency of the living Christ and lives in the glory of that presence and in the power of that sufficiency, has already caught the secret of what we are trying to say. Let him simply open his soul to that presence and trust in that sufficiency. Special programs of conference and prayer in quest of the Holy Spirit may be useful and they may be mischievous. All depends upon the accompanying teaching and management.

Spirituality and efficiency in a truly spiritual evangelism are not measured by crowds. It is not true that evangelical correctness of spirit and doctrine insures a hearing. Some men have a power of popular appeal that will secure an audience no matter what they may have to say. They would draw a crowd to an auction. Others, equally spiritual and orthodox, preach to small audiences all their lives; yet they win souls to Christ and have a happy experience and a blessed ministry. He who appeals to the number of his hearers to prove his superior spirituality and orthodoxy is simply a vainglorious fool. It is sometimes helpful to study the case of Jesus when he could not get people to listen to him. He was never more spiritual than when the crowd left him.

Ecclesiastical coops cannot contain the Holy Spirit. He passes over our sectarian names and our pet groupings. He is at large in the world he made, carrying on the work that Jesus began out of doors. He blesses us indeed by using us. Our testimony has a place in his redemptive scheme. But above us, in us, through us and beyond us, he is convincing the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment. Admit him, but do not try to exploit him. Sometimes, it is to be feared, he must wait till the earthquake, wind and fire of our officious demonstrativeness have blown over, ere he finds opportunity to say sweetly in his own way what he wants to say.

For light on the word of Christ, for an understanding of the mind of Christ, for guidance in the way of Christ, for effectiveness in the testimony of Christ, for joy in the fellowship of Christ, tarry with him until filled with his Spirit.

Were the Bereans Wise?

IN THE BAPTIST of Sept. 25 in an editorial entitled, "Disciples or Dogmatists?" appeared these words of comment, "The Berean example is still valid." The reference was to the words of Luke in Acts 17:11: "Now these were more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, examining the scriptures daily, whether these things were so." A significant mark of New Testament evangelism, at least in Berea, lay in the fact that the converts did not accept the message of the evangelist as final, but went back of it to the scriptures which they individually studied with a view to checking up on the value of the gospel which was being proclaimed to them by Paul. These converts were hospitable toward the message of the preacher and open-minded to his gospel; but not for a moment did they permit themselves to be swept off their feet by his appeal. With free inquiry and intelligent approach they sought to base their faith in Christ and their loyalty to Christ upon their own judgment of what the scriptures taught. The whole editorial to which we refer was written with undeviating consistency around an appreciation of the Berean example, and the last thing thought of was that any well-instructed Baptist would dissent from it.

But Frank M. Goodchild in the fundamentalist page of the Watchman-Examiner does dissent. He objects strenuously. It is "amazing", he thinks, and suggests to him the case of a young graduate of some theological seminary, both unnamed, who went out to preach with no clear conception of the gospel message. Like some self-appointed detective he catches THE BAPTIST advocating an uncertain gospel, and with characteristic sleuthing he lays his repressive hands upon the editorial in question and holds it up as a sample of what he thinks is the "uncertain tone" of the paper. He is sure that those for whom he speaks are against the thing that he thus caricatures as our meaning, and he sounds a loud, and withal a perfectly proper call, in which THE BAPTIST is also equally urgent, for an earnest and positive evangelism.

Particularly, the burden of his criticism is directed against a section of the editorial which he quotes as follows: "Suppose, for instance, that he (the prospective convert) should release the power of his mind to ask for light on some of the questions of evangelical religion. Is God a person? What is meant by three persons in the Trinity? When and where and how did the scriptures originate? What part did God have in producing them? What is a miracle? Of what use is it? What part had God in causing the death of Jesus? Is there a future life? Am I saved? How do I know whether or not I am saved?"

The reader will be somewhat amazed to discover that the words in parenthesis (the prospective convert) in the quotation were not in the editorial but were inserted by Doctor Goodchild himself. THE BAPTIST had no such person in mind as a prospective convert when the editorial was written. We had converts in mind and so specifically state in the words, "Shall he (the evangelist) strive to awaken his converts to free inquiry on their own initiative and leave them to form their own free conclusions upon Christian truth from the sources of information available to them?" The terms are so clear as to make misunderstanding of them impossible to a careful reader. Again and again throughout the editorial "converts" and no "prospective converts" are specified. This is a mere question of fact calling for no further comment.

If Doctor Goodchild thinks it is wrong to put the Bible in the hands of the convert and encourage him to seek for light and understanding on the elementary teachings of the Christian faith, of course, he is entitled to his own opinion in the matter. But THE BAPTIST believes that the Christian who makes an honest and sustained effort to find out for himself what the scriptures teach on those subjects is doing something consistent with evangelical standards, pleasing to God and absolutely essential to an intelligent faith.

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

ting God in through ors of the Laboratory

Contemplate the atom. Scientists now tell us that the atom is about to be reduced to pure energy acting with most inconceivable intensity and intelligence. In that case, matter is merely a way in which that energy manifests itself, and the ground of matter is spirit. Consider what such a discovery means for religion. First, it blows materialism into thin air. In the second place, just as the development of astronomy has given a wondrous extension to the idea of the transcendence and power of God, so the discovery of a spiritual base for the existence of the atom makes God's immanence inexpressibly more significant. Not only "every common bush" but every ordinary thing is "afire with God". In the outcome, spirit is all that matters. And what becomes of the old distinction between the natural and the supernatural?

pital and Labor Start
arrel at Church Doors

Detroit dramatizes the class struggle. The American Federation of Labor in session in that city was invited to employ speakers for the Y. M. C. A. and for some of the churches on Sunday. The invitation was accepted. Detroit business men notified the church bodies that if labor delegates were permitted to speak, employers would expect to be permitted to answer from the same platforms. The churches reconsidered and most of them withdrew their invitations. The seriousness of the issue thus raised is amply indicated in the language employed by the business men. It is thus reported: "If the ministers of Detroit use their pulpits to men who are admittedly attacking our government and our American plan of employment, it is certain that they will submit to our request to furnish speakers on the following Sunday—Detroit speakers who will be happy to show that our city has outstripped all of our rivals simply because she has been unfettered by labor organizations". In the light of that statement is the public to understand that the program of the American Federation of Labor, the industrial creed of the Federal Council of Churches, and the observance of Labor day are admitted attacks upon "our government"? The charge of constructive reason has endured a good deal of stretching lately. Perhaps it can be stretched far enough to cover this case.

l This War
into the Churches?

For some time there has been a muttering of thunder over the church horizon over the industrial creed of the religious bodies and over a tendency in those bodies to cultivate sympathetic relations with organized labor. The withdrawal by the churches in Detroit, at the demand of business men, of invitations to labor representatives to speak in the pulpits on a recent Sunday is something more than a rumble. It is a clap of thunder. It may mean that the churches will have to make some vital decisions in the near future. Shall they hunt cover and forget their creed of brotherhood? Shall they frankly cut loose from antagonistic business interests, with the loss of support which in a course would involve, and make common cause with organized labor in the class struggle? Shall they undertake on fundamental grounds to evaluate the present industrial system from the Christian point of view, and to find the way to a better one? Shall they take the cue suggested by the Detroit business men and throw open the doors to a frank discussion of the whole subject from all points of view, after the manner of the Forum and the Inquiry? One thing they cannot do: they cannot pull Jesus out of the crowd into the cloister.

Is the Social Gospel a Failure?

The phrase, "the social gospel", has considerable currency. But what is the social gospel? If anybody ever conceived the gospel of Christ merely as a device for improving social conditions, the failure of such a gospel was inevitable. It lacked both the foundation and the forces requisite for success. But if the gospel of Christ be conceived in its original purpose as the highest expression of real religion out of which grow certain normal social consequences, then it is the most triumphantly successful enterprise in the world, not excepting even modern plutocracy. Under its inspiring impulse the people all over the world are struggling into light and life and are lifting up their hands toward the ideals of freedom, justice, peace, goodwill, brotherhood and the common good.

With Apologies to Britain
This Thing Ought to Be Said

British enjoy moral lectures from America no more than Americans enjoy those from Great Britain. But hard times there contrasted with good times here awaken thoughts and some evidence of feeling on that side of the Atlantic. Debt, debt, debt, keeps thumping in British consciousness. But a thump from another quarter is timely. British spend $1,580,000,000 a year for intoxicating drink. Americans save nearly $2,000,000,000 a year by prohibition. This single item accounts for an economic disparity between the two countries of about $3,500,000,000 a year. The British drink bill would pay the British debt in less than five years, with Britain growing richer all the time.

Balking and Stalling
At the Living Wage

Stephen Du Brul in the Commonweal challenges the doctrine of the living wage. He instances a small manufacturer who may find himself in such circumstances that he must cut wages or go into bankruptcy. But the remedy for such cases is to organize business on a scale sufficiently large to avoid that contingency. The whole economic order cannot stop because some small business man finds difficulty in adjusting himself to this order. The people must work to live and they must have a chance to live by their labor.

Does Mr. Ford Realize
Where He Is Going?

If Henry Ford does not know business, who does? This page has called attention casually, and with some timidity, to the new class struggle arising between organized industry and organized finance. But Mr. Ford does not hesitate. He says editorially in the Dearborn Independent: "The nation itself, which is the creator of money, must halt upon the threshold of every work of vast public benefit and bind itself into debt, must beg its own money from private owners and brokers thereof, must bind itself to pay part of the public part of the benefit in the form of interest to those private owners and brokers, before works of great public benefit can proceed." If this is economic heresy, silence the heretic. If not, an issue is growing up which is no less moral than economic, and civilization must face it.

Cheap Churches and Million-Dollar Theaters

By JOSEPH HUDNUT

THE most imposing building on any Main street, excepting only the First National bank, is the movie theater; and even the bank, which is apt to be wrapped in that reticence proper to classic dignity, must nowadays yield to this newcomer on the street the first rank, if not in stateliness, at least in ornateness, in luxury, in expense, in all that catches the eye, and the pocketbook, of our hurrying population.

This has come to pass in a few years. Nearly all of us can remember the modest, not to say mean, origin of this upstart which now arrogantly possesses the town. Did it not begin, twenty years ago, as a little peep-show around the corner? The peep-show presently became the entertainment hall fitted out over the hardware store where we crept after supper to see the blurred and shaken images of John Bunny and of "our Mary." Then came the shop, converted into a theater, with its plate-glass front replaced with weird atrocities in plaster enframing the livid posters that announced the "new drama", and after that the old fashioned (ten years old!) movie theater, tight and square, with a long aisle leading through darkness, and an infinite perspective, to the brilliant, agitated screen; and now—

Now we have a palace, a place with marble front, great columns, and a marquee flaming with colored light; within, a gorgeous vestibule ablaze with marble inlay, with gilded ornament, and deep hangings of brocaded silk; beyond, in the darkened space of a vast auditorium, we glimpse along the edge of balconies, around the margin of the wide proscenium, over the wide arch of the ceiling, the modeled forms of an ornate architecture, enlivened with painted fantasies and relieved by crystal chandeliers.

Who built this palace? For whom was it designed?

We built it, and we built it for ourselves. We, who built the First Baptist church and the Methodist church and the Protestant Episcopal church and dedicated them to the austere and beautiful service of our religion, have built also the movie palace and dedicated it to the shadowy pastime that it offers us.

I do not want our churches to be ornate or expensive or magnificent. I do not want them to look like movie theaters. I am not even in favor of a monumental architecture for churches, or of a decorative or emotional or traditional architecture if that lays a heavy burden on those who cannot bear it. I want our churches to be simple, practical, honest structures, fitted in every way to bear a useful part in the great battle against the evils of modern life. I believe in plainness and simplicity; I like the American spirit of economy and reticence in buildings. Yet it seems to me that economy and reticence have taken a somewhat surprising direction of late. When I turn from the grandeur of the theaters we have built and see how plain are the church buildings, I must protest. Have we not lost for a moment something of that sense of proportion, of fitness, of balance in which we take so just a pride? Are plainness and economy such ecclesiastical virtues that they must be reserved for the church alone?

Two blocks from Main street, on the corner lot that edges on one side the business district and on the other side looks toward the first residences, stands the building of the First Baptist church. Like the theater, it is a newcomer, built only a few years ago as the result of a brilliant campaign carried on by the new minister. We contributed, generously we thought, to that campaign. We remember the glow of satisfaction we felt when we first saw the architect's water-color: the stately portico with purple blue shadows cast on its gleaming columns, the noble mass of the auditorium rising over a sea of automobiles; and beyond, row after row, the rhythmic windows of our new Sunday-school rooms. Certainly our architect promised us a lot for our money. We were proud of the design; and because we have never critically looked at it since, we are still proud of it.

Spire of the First Methodist church, Charlottesville, Va. The cost of this heaven-pointing spire was not more than two weeks' receipts at the box office of the Charlottesville theater.

But look at it! Look at it as you come from an afternoon at the movie palace.

Clothed in the best second-class red common brick or in what is infinitely worse, yellow brick, trimmed at the corners and windows with dirt-gray cast imitation sandstone; with steps of grimy cement leading up to wooden or pressed tin columns—which betray, when you kick them, their hollow hearts; decked out in glued-on composition ornament; roofed in asbestos shingles, and glazed—of a shade of William Morris!—with smears of sickly opalescent green, crazily patterned with squirming lines of lead; what a travesty is this temple on the one that we intended

What has happened? What was it that made our building so glorious on paper, so mean, so shabby, so second-rate in the realization?

The answer is simple: we were too easily satisfied. We wanted a lot for our money so far as quantity was concerned, but so long as we got something big, something imposing, we were willing to take the second-best or third-best in quality. We wanted floor space and mass; everything else about the building could be cheap.

Cheap planning was to blame, first of all. We told our architect to make use of every inch of floor, to make the most possible allowance for such breathing space as is afforded by wide corridors and stairs or for the dignity and comfort given by spacious entrance halls and direct, unobstructed circulation. The fine vestibule we admire in the theater is "waste space" in the church.

Cheap construction was another factor. We had to build cheaply, the architect told us, or we could not get the space and size we wanted. So we built thin brick walls, stud partitions, light trusses overhead and meager foundations below. We built the theater permanently and safely; but here we took every chance that the inspector would permit.

We used cheap materials, substituting anything that would save a dollar: cement for granite, stucco for limestone, tin for copper, "art stone"—villainous invention!—for marble.

The decorations were cheap: paint for enamel, rubber oleum for tile, opalescent pudding for cathedral glass, painted hemlock for oak, and pressed metal for the coffers on the ceiling.

We furnished our church with birch-stained pews, candleholders of gilded chalk, and a set of ready-to-wear altar furniture selected from the catalog of an East Chicago mail-order house.

Finally, we employed cheap brains, the cut-rate architect who gave a rebate in the form of a handsome subscription. Training costs money, and so does taste, experience, and intelligence. We make a big saving when we leave these out. And truly, those dispensable luxuries have been omitted, throughout the breadth of our land, in half the buildings which are named—with how much unconscious irony I cannot say—"houses of God".

Across the space called Main street the church and the water wage a silent and incessant competition, a competition not less unmistakable for being mute. The prizes they play for are the hearts of the boys and girls who visit now one, now the other. We pay for both buildings. We support both; and both, in just proportion, are worthy of our support. Which one shall we equip for victory in the competition? To which shall we award the prize?

Built of fine limestone with granite steps, this portico of the First Methodist Church, Jamaica, N. Y., forms a dignified and attractive facade.

The Church Problem

THE amount of important church work that is now going on is one of the amazing items in the present-day practice of architecture. In many cities new edifices are under way or on the boards which call for the expenditure of millions. In the solution of their problems the designers have been called upon in many instances to choose between two parties, one representing the commercial aspect of the building, the other, the spiritual. The sky-scraper church is a direct product of our commercialism. It is the child of big business. The decision between the two types, the combination office-building and church and the purely churchly, is not left to the architect. It is a matter for the trustees and the building committee. But to presuppose an open-minded board, which is perhaps "some dream!", the architect's opinion may be asked and may carry considerable weight. It is incumbent upon him, therefore, to approach the subject in advance and decide what he would do if he had the opportunity.

In its essence the problem boils down to the individual conception of religion. We have often been asked, "Is architecture a business or a profession?" The same question might well be asked regarding religion. If, in order to live, it must consort with rental agents, offices, stores and movie palaces, the answer is in the composite type of building. If it is strong enough to stand alone, then by all means let it be housed in an edifice apart. Deep down under the decision to be made is a theory to which there must be a right and a wrong answer.

We feel that the more sensitive architects, the profounder philosophers and the more truly spiritual leaders will agree that by far the most powerful appeal will be made to the people by a church or a cathedral which is just that and nothing else. Surely it is enough. As a house of God, a memorial to the highest personality which the human mind has ever conceived, it has sufficient reason for being. In this idea of a church will be found inspiration for greater beauty both of idea and expression. In the end it will probably be more truly successful than the towering neighbor which thinks of income in terms of dollars rather than of communicants.—The Architect.

What Our New Church Means to Us in Terms of Service

The Baptist Temple, Rochester, N. Y.

BY CLINTON WUNDER, MINISTER

IT MEANS that 7000 people pass through our doors each week in church activities during the busy winter months.

It means that the neighborhood comes in contact with the gospel through hundreds of children who meet in clubs and classes and a Saturday school.

It means a cafeteria, supper and banquet service that feeds as many as 3500 people in a single week.

It means crowded Sunday services with the "Standing Room Only" sign frequently posted in the lobbies.

It means that we are holding for Christ a strategic downtown center through a combination office building and church, which in time will pay for itself and provide revenue for the operating cost.

It means clubs for business women, boy scout troops, and noon organ recitals.

It means a graded Bible-school program of religious education that functions every day.

It means the support of missionary programs at home and abroad.

It means the solution of the down-town church problem by staying to do battle with a building which provides its own sinews of war.

It means the religion of Jesus translated into practical service where the multitude may come and be helped.

Evanston Baptist Church, Illinois

BY JAMES MADISON STIFLER, MINISTER

OURS is both a suburban and an educational community. Teachers and students form one-third of the population. The majority of the 2000 people who cross the church thresholds each week are busy, progressive people. We are able to serve them in many ways. The young married women may use our gymnasium for athletics. Our handsome rooms and trained staff enable us to conduct a daily kindergarten and first grade school under church auspices. This is done at a low cost to the patrons, and is not surpassed in the city in either equipment or quality of teaching. Many a young mother finds domestic life vastly relieved because her children are so well cared for each day. It gives her a breathing space and the children a more wholesome day than playing in an apartment courtyard.

We are able to provide meeting places for a score or more of useful organizations each year, thus furthering their causes. Our well-furnished rooms make possible private weddings and funerals in quarters much more adequate than small apartments.

To the large troops of boy and girl scouts we give permanent quarters and the backing that makes success assured.

There is no Y. W. C. A. in our city but a local enterprise that corresponds to it. Our gymnasium is given over to it one evening each week. Another evening it is given to a group of girls who work in the numerous cafeterias and hotels. These girls may also use a lounging room equipped with a sewing machine.

Perhaps the greatest service that the new church house renders is in the sphere of education. The Bible school is now as well run and equipped as the public schools and holds a place of corresponding respect in the minds of the children. University students find friendship and instruction and social contacts. The week-day school of religious education is as well or better equipped here than in the public school buildings.

There is scarcely an aspect of the social and educational life of our city in which our church house does not serve.

Greece Baptist Church, Greece, N. Y.

BY FRED E. DEAN, MINISTER

A RURAL church in process of being swallowed by a growing city must win its new neighbors or die. Our new church house helps us to live, even to thrive.

It provides for a fully graded Sunday school and has encouraged the enlistment and training of a competent teaching staff. Our school wins and holds new members and trains them for leadership. Due to graded worship our young people today can conduct the regular Sunday services of the church unaided.

Weekly entertainments in the assembly hall have developed a unique following of all religious opinions. These people, many of whom would not think of entering our sanctuary, look forward to Friday evening as a bright spot in the week. This is not propaganda, but a sincere effort to serve the community and to help make neighbors out of strangers.

Provision for basket ball and kindred sports has made the church a center for young people. There are not enough evenings in the week to accommodate the groups desiring to use the hall. A well-equipped kitchen and dining service makes dinners and social events a joy. Community and county-wide conference gatherings seek our hospitality and are easily and willingly served.

The nursery, the most beautiful and best equipped room in the church, spells rest and opportunity to mothers of young children. Sixteen babies from three months to three years old were cared for last Sunday.

Weekly contact with every Protestant family of the neighborhood is provided by volunteer office help through the church office which is open every day and evening.

Our new church house is a modern social and educational machine which consecrated workers joyfully use to serve the church and community.

DeKalb, Illinois, Baptist Church

BY FRED W. FIELD, MINISTER

"O WORSHIP the Lord in the beauty of holiness means more to us now than ever before; in fact, we can almost claim that we worship the Lord in the "holiness of beauty". We have made use of the powerful appeal of beauty, the absence of which greatly handicaps the religious appeal. People do worship God amidst dreary surroundings but the human heart responds more quickly when stimulated by chaste and beautiful aids to worship. The auditorium with graceful Gothic curves decorated in delicate shades of Italian gray, the pipe organ with ornamental plaster grille front inset and a perfect art glass reproduction of Hoffman's "Christ in Gethsemane", electrically illuminated both day and night, make a tremendous appeal to the human heart to "bow down and worship". When arrested and held by exquisite beauty and appropriate religious symbolism, men and women become conscious of the glory of God. The church house is a unique manner ministers to the community. Those coming to behold, remain to worship.

Adequate physical equipment is essential to effective religious education. The Sunday school, released from cramped quarters, now rejoices in a new freedom with assembly halls for each department, and a sufficiency of classrooms. The pupils have great respect for a Bible school that provides for efficiency. Teachers find their task easier and more productive of the desired results. Childhood and youth are being ministered unto in a manner heretofore impossible.

People are fond of church suppers, socials, class parties, and all that pertains to the social life and fellowship of the church. This phase of church life was scarcely touched prior to the possession of the new building. Now, with a large ground-floor basement easily subdivided into smaller rooms, with a place for wraps, and the best of kitchen equipment, we are able to minister to the social and fellowship phases of our community life. Many outside organizations as well as those of the church gladly avail themselves of the fine facilities the new church house affords.

Englewood Baptist Church, Chicago

By CHARLES ALVIN BROOKS, MINISTER

MARK TWAIN facetiously remarked that every one talks about the weather but no one does anything about it. So the young people of the church and the unchurched community might retort in the spirit of the baptized father of the boy at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration.

A conception of a wide-reaching service controlled by arrangement in the construction of our new building, with the beautifully appointed nursery with a trained attendant, to the culinary department and every club and classroom.

The combination of a program of religious education including the social and recreational life of our church and Sunday school, and an endeavor to meet the daily opportunity of a community swarming with boys and girls, called for unusual treatment in the furnishing of many rooms. It determined the arrangement of the control room and the other administration offices of the church, and made necessary the employment of a staff which enables us to keep the building open for service seven days a week. Our facilities have made it possible for us to work out a fine relationship with the great school of 10,000 pupils across the way. Last June the senior class had its annual banquet in our banquet room, and classes use our recreation room under the supervision of their own teachers; every day the pupils crowd in upon us more rapidly than we are prepared to meet their needs.

Our community has many newly married couples, and a large number of young unmarried business men and women room in our vicinity. A large apartment house of three and four-room suites is being erected next door and newcomers constantly settling in our neighborhood make the demand for a neighborhood center which we are endeavoring to meet.

I cannot interpret our ideal better than we expressed it in our service of dedication, a part of which is subjoined.

To the ministries of Christian fellowship, for the encouragement of all who are weary, the strengthening of all who are tried, for the practice of brotherhood and human friendliness,

We consecrate this building and our own service.

To the fellowship of prayer, to vicarious intercession for the sick and the needy, to Christian witness and the winning of disciples to Christ and the extension of his kingdom throughout the world,

We dedicate this place and our lives anew.

To the teaching and the study of the Bible as the revelation of the will of God, to the training of Christian leadership in a rounded program of religious education,

We dedicate this building.

To the earnest endeavor to discover the mind of Christ regarding all human relationships and responsibilities in that we may follow the Christian way of life,

We consecrate this house and our hearts and minds and wills anew.

For those whom Jesus loved so much, the little children, and our growing boys and girls who are the hope of tomorrow,

With joy and love and earnest prayer that here they may early learn to love and trust and follow Christ, we dedicate this house.

To all wholesome recreation, to games of skill and endurance, for the discipline of the powers of self control and training of character,

We devote the recreation room of this house with earnest prayer that all may use it to the glory of God.

To the social life of our young people, to the joy of simply being together, to the enjoyment of good music and inspiring reading and quiet talks and the discovery of all that is loveliest and best in one another and in life together,

We joyfully consecrate those rooms set apart thereto and pray that God may bless our young men and young women.

And now to the unfolding of new vistas and of heavenly visions, the dreaming of beautiful dreams with lofty aspirations and high purposes to make them come true, to the enlistment of well-trained lives in the service of Christ for the conquest of the world,

We dedicate this entire structure and our whole lives through Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom be all praise and glory, now and evermore. Amen.

The Gift of Speech

By RUBY WEYBURN TOBIAS

*HOW she thrilled my youthful spirit, how he stirred
All my soul to high endeavor, as I heard;
One clear clarion of the dawn,
Calling on and up and on,
Scaling white, star-circled mountains with a word!*

*How she caught my wayward fancy with a breath;
With a syllable restored my errant faith;
Chose from out life's alphabet
Letters soft and slight, and yet
Strong as life, and stronger far than death.*

*Words like light—the little shy, elusive things;
Words like lightning as it searches, as it stings;
Words that flutter each to each—
Crowns and empires are their speech;
Destinies are folded underneath their wings.*

*And I pray, as they have wrought their spell on me,
Touching tongues with fire to make me wise and free,
Some small word may find its way
Through my eager lips today,
And go singing on through all eternity.*

Music—"The Handmaid of Religion"

BY FREDERICK MAXSON, ORGANIST AND MUSICAL DIRECTOR OF FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA

IF MUSIC is "the handmaid of religion," its use in the church should enhance and strengthen other portions of the service. To accomplish this, cooperation of environment and of various influences is important. Let us discuss some of these points in order.

The Church Building

An up-to-date church building should contain the recent improvements and accessories which make it complete and comfortable, fitted to be used properly in carrying out its mission in the world.

Among the attractive features of a church building are the bells, chimes, or carillons usually placed in the church tower. The bells notify the community that a church service is about to be held. The chimes extend an impressive invitation by playing familiar hymn tunes, leading the thoughts of the worshiper (both on his way to church and after his arrival) to the sentiment of the words associated with those tunes. Carillons are a recent acquisition to bell equipment and few American churches possess a set. Since they require special skill, players sometimes have been brought from Europe.

The acoustics of the auditorium should be good, and the room cheerful and well lighted. Its dimensions should not be greater than the size of the congregation justifies. This adds to the effectiveness of the music, making it more "intimate" and hearty. For good musical effect heavy draperies, carpets and cushions should be used in moderation.

The Organ

The auditorium should be equipped with as fine an organ as the means of the congregation will enable it to procure, but suited to its needs, for the various tone qualities which a good organist may produce from a fine instrument give him almost unlimited opportunity to make his accompaniments as well as his organ solos pleasing and interesting. There is no single effect in modern organs more admired than the organ chimes. A good set of twenty tubular organ chimes costs about $700 or $800. Chimes may be added to any instrument, and are frequently given as memorials.

The selection of the organ and its builder should not be left to chance, or the order given to a firm simply through favoritism or a general impression on the part of the organ committee that everything will surely be satisfactory. It frequently happens that a committee, because of unfamiliarity with the technical details of the organ specifications given, decides on the builder who seems to give the most for the money, rather than the best quality of materials and workmanship, only to discover its mistake when it is too late to rectify it. The organ funds should be expended wisely and judiciously, even though it may be necessary to add to the expense of the organ by securing the advice of a dependable and unbiased organ expert; for in organs, as in everything else, quantity does not imply quality unless the price is ample. The committee should bear in mind that an organ once purchased must be heard for many years.

The Hymnals

The market is flooded with hymnals. Some are voluminous, with a thousand or more hymns, making an awkward unwieldy book. Out of this large number only a comparatively few can possibly be used. The ideal hymnal should contain several hundred hymns of good literary and devotional quality, set to good music. Favorite hymns should be retained, set to the time-honored tunes with which they are associated. Other settings may be included for occasional use. The airs should be suited to congregational singing. A good hymnal should also contain responsive readings, with and without musical accompaniment. The use of a hymnal which harbors the jazzy, jiggy and so-called spirited tunes of no musical value should be consistently discouraged in churches which desire a spiritual uplift from hymn singing. Singing trashy tunes ultimately undermines musical taste. Compare some of them with such sturdy tunes as "Christinas" (Awake my soul, stretch every nerve), or "Italian Hymn" (Come thou almighty King) and note the combination of dignity and rhythm in the latter two.

When the selection of the proper hymnal has been made the church should supply a copy for each member of the congregation.

The Choir

The church choir has become a necessity. We might paraphrase the old quotation by saying, "Men may come, and men may go, but choirs go on forever." This must not be taken too literally, however, for choirs do stop singing eventually, and even the longest anthem or cantata comes to an end at last, leaving a final impression on the congregation of either delight and uplift, or relief, depending upon the ability of the choir and the selection and preparation of the music.

The dresses and the hats of the women members of the choir have given opportunity in the past for a display of glaring combinations and unpleasant color contrasts, causing comment in and out of the choir. In addition, a sort of unequal competition has been invited through the ability of some choir members to dress better than others. For this reason choir gowns or vestments are now more frequently used in non-liturgical churches, making a corresponding improvement in the appearance of the choir. Black poplin vestments are inexpensive and durable. Mortarboards or small caps may be worn by the women and neat white collars may be added to the gowns. Some churches copy the Episcopal vestments, using close-fitting black cassocks and white cottas, giving more variety of color than the academic gowns.

The Service

If the feeling of reverence with which our Catholic friends enter their church edifices could be transferred to the congregations of Protestant churches, there would be distinct gain in the atmosphere and impressiveness of our worship. Then each worshiper would enter quietly, kneel or bow the head, and be in sympathy with the service from the first note of the organ, which should be the actual beginning of the service.

Let me make a plea for punctuality. The entire service can be materially weakened by the tardy assembling of the congregation. It is practically impossible to put vigor and spirit into the beginning of a service when only a comparative handful of people are present, to say nothing of the distraction caused by late arrivals. Nothing short of actual inability to arrive on time should make any one feel justified in being late to service.

Better results are obtained if the ushers seat the congregation as compactly as possible. No one can sing or take part heartily if isolated in a pew. Should he attempt to so, he becomes conspicuous and eventually gives up the effort. This is a case where by standing shoulder to shoulder and taking part heartily, one and one makes much more than two.

The congregation should follow the lead of the choir and organ intelligently in the hymns and musical responses. The members of the choir should show a feeling of reverence both in deportment and singing and by their interest and cooperation aid in making the service a success. Present-day singers are apt to be less reverent than those of former years, for general conditions tend more toward levity than reverence.

The organ postlude could well be included in the actual service, as is sometimes done, while the congregation sits quietly and listens, for the organ frequently has a message at this time supplementary to the sermon and service. At the conclusion of the postlude all are free to converse. Should the postlude be played after the service, there should be no loud talking, out of courtesy to the player if for no other reason, until the postlude has been finished.

The Picture Speaks

By HARRY S. MYERS

THE old Spanish proverb, "All roads lead to the bull ring," is now changed to "All roads lead to the movies," and this change in Spain is typical of the change everywhere. Picture writing was mankind's first attempt to use written characters. The picture spoke a language that was understood by all. There is no method of education that reaches so many people day by day and night by night as pictures. Some of the pictures are atrocious, some are false to ethical and artistic sense, but pathos, romance, humor and ideals are all pictured and the people learn.

Faith is an element of success, and imagination is an element of faith. It is its foundation. A picture touches the imagination and starts it working. The vast majority of people are ignorant of the fine literature that President Coolidge named to Bruce Barton as comprising the literature that had affected his life and thinking; but the picture rouses the imagination in these multitudes in whom imagination has been suppressed for centuries. The extent and significance of the use of the picture on human life is as yet unmeasured and it is not realized or appreciated by the majority of persons. The picture rouses the imagination, stimulates it and feeds it. No one has yet been able to calculate the response. Go to Superior, Syracuse, Salt Lake City, Calcutta, Rangoon, Shanghai, Manila, Tokyo, Matadi, Cairo, and the crowds jostle one another in an attempt to get to the pictures. The picture stirs the imagination.

As I was passing through the galleries of the art museum in Dresden to find the picture of the Sistine

Madonna, a friend from home accosted me saying that he knew where I was going and added that I should like the picture. As I stood before the adoring mother with the babe in her arms, the old man and woman with satisfaction in their faces, and the little cherubs watching, I realized that no matter where the eye happens to fall on the canvas, it goes directly to the babe. He is the center of the picture. The robes and mantles are painted in rich colors. The sky adds its charm and the cherubs their smiles. But one cannot see the picture by reading this. He must go to Dresden and let it speak to him as it does to the quiet and changing processions that pass through that room every day.

The Ladies' Home Journal has become noted for its many pictures. Some of America's greatest artists contribute their finest work to it. In a recent book, Mark Sullivan, whose daily news letters are found in many dailies, says: "A picture can tell more than a page of text."

Many educational and promotional agencies are ahead of the church in the use of curios, models, maps, charts, graphs, photographs, slides and movies. For many years New York City has had lecture courses in the public school buildings. In the fall of 1926 all these lectures except those using pictures were abolished and the money saved will be spent on additional pictures. This is the result of a test that has extended over many years. The pictures give the message better than the voice alone. The pictures speak effectively.

The Presence of God

By WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH

*I*N the castle of my soul
Is a little postern gate,
Whereat, when I enter,
I am in the presence of God.
In a moment, in the turning of a thought,
I am where God is.
This is a fact.

When I enter in to God,
All life has a meaning.
Without asking, I know;
My desires are even now fulfilled,
My fever is gone
In the great quiet of God.
My troubles are but pebbles on the road,
My joys are like the everlasting hills.

So it is when I step through the gate of prayer
From time into eternity.
When I am in the consciousness of God,
My fellow men are not far off and forgotten,
But close and strangely dear.
Those whom I love
Have a mystic value.
They shine as if a light were glowing within them.

So it is when my soul steps through the postern gate
Into the presence of God.
Big things become small, and small things become great.
The near becomes far, and the future is near.
The lowly and despised is shot through with glory.

The Devotional Life

Does God Care?

BY EDGAR WHITAKER WORK

IF GOD does not care, this world is the loneliest place in all creation. The light has gone out. There is perpetual shadow. The earth is cold; the heavens are brass; life has lost its wings. A vast vacancy remains, a deep homesickness of soul. It is appalling to lose faith in the care and providence of God.

Does God Care? Nature is the first to answer, "Yes." The magnitudes of creation, do they seem to lack care? The cluster of the Pleiades, the bands of Orion, who but God is the Caretaker of them all? The infinitesimals of creation—molecules, atoms, electrons—not one of them can fall. Do living things lack care? Jesus gave two examples: the sparrow, "Not one of them shall fall on the ground," and men, "The very hairs of your head are all numbered." Eloquently nature proclaims the particular providence of God.

Experience Speaks

Human instincts and experiences unite to say, "He cares." Our knowledge of God as a living and loving Person strengthens this faith. We cannot think of God as not caring. Earthly parents, imperfect, care for their children. Shall not God, the Perfect One, give good things to his children? This was a beautiful argument of One who knew. If you tell me that my God does not care when I am in trouble, then I must change all my ideas of his character. I must think of him as far away and unconcerned. His arm is shortened, he cannot reach me. His will is weak, he cannot hold me up. His love is cold, he cannot warm me. If God does not care, everything is changed for me. Men and women do not care; they are far below God. Indifference sits at life's helm. God himself is changed.

Strange how men—even wicked men—cling to God's care. Sin and like a jewel in the dust. A story unbelief may mar it. Still it shines used to be told in the West of a stranger who came to a mining camp. He was an atheist. The miners listened to him in silence. There came a day when one of them laid away his daughter—his one little ewe lamb. That evening there was serious talk in one of the saloons. The men were trying in their rude way to comfort the father. The atheist interrupted, "There is no God. If there be one he does not care." Then a strange thing occurred. Those godless men arose and thrust out the man who told them that God does not care.

We know God's care by experience. We have felt his everlasting arms beneath us. We have been conscious of a Presence nearer to us than hands and feet, closer than breathing. How many occasions have there been when our loneliness was cured, our fears scattered, by divine companionship. A single personal experience of God's care lights up the whole of life.

Does God care? In ten thousand places and ways the Bible says, "Yes." It is full to running over with God's care. Three books out of sixty-six describe it in story form: Ruth, Esther, Philemon. Add another life story, Job. The Proverbs is almost a manual on the subject. There are precepts, maxims, incidents, teachings, examples everywhere. Abraham, singled out for his great work, Joseph, guided through peril to power, Moses who might have died in infancy, are outstanding examples.

All-Surrounding Love

The New Testament magnifies, illuminates, the Old. With what winsomeness the Master speaks of God, Our Father. O the eloquence, the far reach, of two such words. "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" "One moving sentence out-reaches all the philosophies, 'God is love!'" Omit God's care and you would not recognize your Bible. It is saturated with providence. Here we see how near and tender our heavenly Father is, how minute and inexhaustible his love. No, says the book over and over again, we "cannot drift beyond his love and care".

Greatest of all answers is Christ himself, beloved Son of his Father and ours. Enter with him the shadows of Gethsemane. Stand alongside his cross on Calvary. Linger at the open tomb in the garden. Climb to the hill where he ascended. Yes, God cares!

Nature, instinct, faith, life itself, the Bible, prayer, the Christian experience of God all tell us that God cares. From Bethlehem to Calvary, on to the resurrection and the ascension, the gospel proclaims that God cares.

All this is true. But why such bewilderment of sorrow? It is the man who has failed who speaks. It is the invalid on his bed with the world going by. It is another with shattered hopes lying at his feet. It is an agonized multitude who have lost loved ones. Why are such catastrophes, such "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune"?

Simply, lovingly, trustfully, let us believe that the "whys" of this earth, so difficult for us, are not unanswerable. If we could see and know all that God sees and knows, what revelations would come. The shadowed side of sorrow is toward us. On the other side must be light!

The Highway to Peace

More than ever God is a Father to souls in distress. Trust him! This is the highway to peace. Trust is better than explanation. More than ever Christ is Saviour, Companion, Elder Brother to burdened hearts. Our sufferings cannot be compared with his. Once even he asked, "Why?" How close he is to us in our blinding griefs, "touched with the feeling of our infirmities". More than ever to doubting spirits in their painful quests the Holy Spirit is Comforter, Teacher, Friend in the House of Interpreter. How rich toward God are the children of suffering.

Be quiet and search earnestly for the softened meanings of life's shadows. Rest deeply in "the patience of unanswered prayer". Walk much in company with the Great Sufferer. And carry life's perplexities bravely to the Bible and the altar of prayer.

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on Devotional Topic for November 7

ARRANGING LIFE'S VALUES

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in Young People's Leader, the official magazine "For All Baptist Young People". Subscriptions to the Leader may be made through the B.Y.P.U. of America at $1 per year.)

"Would you choose the good when you might have the best?"

The material as given in the Leader should be read over several times, as well as at least one of the books listed under "Further Reading". If you want a good, comprehensive and interesting account which lines up with this topic read Brown's "Where Do You Live?" which may be had for $1.50 from the American Baptist Publication Society if your pastor does not have it.

If you want to make this meeting of lasting value, it might be well to have on hand several different articles which might be representative of things in life. For example, a purse may represent money; a tennis racquet, sports; a dish of fruit might represent food; a book might stand for education; a musical instrument for music; a Bible for religion; and any others you might wish to add.

In meeting, ask the young people to suggest an arrangement for these articles in order of their importance. Have them tell why they would give such places to these things. At their suggestion, arrange these articles on the desk or table. After such an arrangement, or during such an arrangement, bring in some of the thoughts as given in the Leader and in the other reading matter. If the articles have not been arranged in their proper order, probably during the presentation of the matter in the Leader you may rearrange them.

The thought should be impressed on the young people that since we have but one life to live, we should live that life in the best way rather than in a merely good way, by giving first things first place in our lives.

An Invitation to American Friendship Dolls to go to Japan for the Doll Festival

COME, dolls of America, you're asked to go To a festival quaint, and you'd like it, I know;
So neatly and daintily dress in your best,
And start on your travels with gladness and zest.
O come by the hundreds and thousands and more,
And journey along to a far distant shore
Where dear little children, with joy and delight,
Will welcome and love you,
their eyes shining bright;
The words they will speak—very strange will they be,
To dolls who have traveled from over the sea.
You'll sit as their guests and watch busy girls try
To learn how to keep their homes tidy—Oh my!—
To make dainty dishes that you've never seen
With bamboo and seaweed and sweet pasty bean;
To bow to their guests in a low,
proper way,
And practice homemaking as though it were play.
And often the neighbors and guests who attend
The festivities gay, will all praise and commend
The lovely American dolls who have come Over land, over sea, far away from their home.
And they'll ask why it is that you dolls have been sent,
Then for answer you'll say that your coming was meant
To tell of the friendship and interest true
Of children whose flag is the red, white, and blue,
For those who are living in cherry-
bloom land,
To whom they would hold out a child's friendly hand.
And the spirit of childhood shall show us the way
To friendship that lasts, and to peace that shall stay.

Bringing Friendship to Cherry-Blossom Land

Isn't it fun to help people when you yourself get a lot of pleasure and joy out of doing the helpful thing? Here is something which you can do to help bring friendship to the people of Japan, and at the same time there will be a lot of fun connected with it. The way in which you can help is by dressing at least one doll to send to Japan. Now don't think this is childish, for it isn't.

Every year for more than a thousand years, the people of Japan celebrate their romantic Festival of Dolls. On the third day of the third month, and continuing for three days, the women and girls dress in their best clothes, take their dolls out of the little white boxes, and place them in array. Then the girls serve their parents at mealtime, and visit with and entertain their friends. This festival has a deep significance, to these people. It is an expression of the ideal of Japanese womanhood—to be a good and true wife, a wise and loving mother.

Whenever possible, dolls are added to the family collections. Don't you think it is an offering of friendship for the young people (and older ones as well) to send to these Japanese families dolls to add to the families? This addition will show that we bear them good-will. It will show them what our American ideals of womanhood are, for we shall dress those dolls as nicely as possible. It may even help these younger girls to become good housekeepers. And it will add much joy to both our American missionaries and the families who receive the dolls.

Thousands of these dolls ought to go over. Won't you see to it that at least one goes? For directions as to the size of doll, shipping, etc., write to the Committee on World Friendship among Children, 289 Fourth ave., New York City. Write soon, because the dolls must be on their way before Dec. 20. You will also learn more about this beautiful festival time in Japan, as well as finding out ways in which you might make the preparation and sending of the dolls an interesting event. (Note: This will help you to make point IX (c) of the Christian Life Program.)

The Chimney Corner

God's Flowers

By MRS. L. T. REYNOLDS

EVERY house on the street was glorified by the pastel pinks and blues of early hyacinths, flaunting red and yellow and pink tulips, and other gay spring flowers that the warmth of the sun had awakened from their winter sleep. It was not until we came to the church, where I was going for an afternoon meeting of the woman's society, that there was a break in the lovely coloring that had entranced my little son, Junior, and myself all the way on the walk from our home. Junior always spoke of the church building as "God's house."

Now after his transports of delight before each new bed of blooms he stopped in front of "God's house," strangely silent and stared. Then he dropped my hand, which he had grasped to squeeze in ecstasy when some fresh beauty met his eye, and tiptoed across the velvet green of the new grass to the side of the church. He came back with a downcast expression on his round, rosy face and shook his head. "Poor God," he said, "he hasn't got any flowers around his house at all and everybody else on the street has some. Are flowers 'sensitive, muvver? Do you 'spose he can't 'ford to have them?"

The church grounds were not neglected, understand, but if a little child missed the flowers so, might they not have been used to give "God's house" as attractive a setting as had the houses of men along the street?

That night Junior brought me his china pig bank and said, "Could we buy God some flowers wiv my money? There's a lot in there, muvver."

Never had a more sincere offering been made to God, perhaps. It was not to be denied. That fall we bought bulbs of every description with the money from Junior's china pig and with other money that was given when people here and there heard of Junior's disappointment because "God had no flowers."

And the following spring—well, God's flowers had come back to him in the beautifying of the surroundings of his house so that people came from all parts of the town to see them and having come thus far, many of them entered the church and stayed for the service.

A Hallowe'en Frolic

By ELLA SCHULER

EVERY ONE enjoys a Hallowe'en affair, so if you're thinking of having any kind of "doings" some time in the near future and want something informal, why not a Hallowe'en frolic? No florist's bill for decorations—just cornstalks and branches of bright autumn leaves—and perhaps the frost will not yet have finished the last of the golden-rod and late purple asters.

The refreshments are easy, too. There are any number of appropriate menus—such as baked beans, served with celery stalks, doughnuts and coffee. If the crowd is a big one, this can be served on one plate, minimizing the work. Another menu includes witch sandwiches (brown bread with a date and cheese filling), witches' brew (a punch of lemons, pineapples, oranges and purple grapes) and devil's food cake. If the number invited is small, an attractive salad can be prepared by making Jack-o-lanterns from apples as follows: Take red apples, cut a face, eyes, nose and mouth in the skin, which leaves the white exposed. Keep it from discoloring by coating with lemon juice. Scoop out the center and fill with diced celery, apple, nut meats mixed with salad dressing. Fill the cavity, top with a nut meat, place the apple on a paper doily on the salad plate and serve with hot cheese wafers. Pumpkin pie makes a good finish for this menu.

It makes it more of a frolic if the guests come disguised and retain their disguises for the best part of the evening. The guessing as to who's who provides constant entertainment.

For fun, there are fortunes to be hidden in nuts or in cake, there is the bobbing for apples—but better than bobbing in a tub of water is the game of having them tied by long strings to a short line. There is indeed considerable bobbing, on the part of the apple as well as the eater. Eating doughnuts in the same fashion is another feat.

The best part of our particular Hallowe'en frolic was suggested by one of the boys on our way home—for we went in a body.

"Let's fill old Mrs. Hathaway's woodshed with fuel," he said. And while the wood was being gathered, along came one of the boys with a great basket of potatoes and apples and cabbage. Which was really a lot more fun than tearing down gates and fences—and quite as much of a surprise for Mrs. Hathaway who had begun to think that young people were in the world for nothing but mischief.

Explaining Mary Luczak

TOTAL depravity of human nature has always been a hard thing to prove. The pessimist who tries to make out a case against human nature is stumped to explain a simple incident like the one reported below.

Mary Luczak lives in one of the towns of the Mohawk valley. Mary is twelve and was born in Lithuania. After school, she often plays along the banks of the New York state barge canal. She loves to watch the men work the locks. . .

Not long ago, a three-year-old boy fell in the canal. Nobody happened to be at hand but Mary. Mary is a girl scout and had learned to swim. There was nothing for her to do but jump into the deep waters of the lock and grab the drowning boy. Then she swam with him to the gate, held on to a bolt or bar, and called for help.

The people of the town thought Mary had done a brave deed. They spoke of a Carnegie award to the fearless and level-headed girl. They asked Mary why she had risked her life to save the lad. Was it in the scout ritual? Did she learn of her duty in the schools or at church? Mary's reply was simple: "My heart told me to do it."

Mary Luczak explained her deed. Now it is up to somebody to explain Mary.

Idleness

"WHO doesn't stop at the top of a long hill to allow the engine to cool?" questions Roe Fulerson in the Kiwanis Magazine. "Some of the best thoughts we ever have come when we seem to be most idle. More than one man has determined on a successful business change while sitting in seeming idleness waiting for a fish to bite."

"To pause to look back and then forward, often increases speed rather than causes delay! We run past more really good things than we catch up with. It was a baker idling at the zoo who first made animal crackers and got rich on them before his competitors woke up."

Rain at Night

*RAIN is a pauper
Shabby and old,
Huddling her shoulders,
Trembling with cold.*

*Night, in a frolic,
When the shades fall,
Lends her a misty,
Silver-gray shawl.*

*Jewels bedeck her Down to her hem,
Each corner arc light
Pins on a gem.*

*Pit-a-pat-pat,
Her silly old feet
Dance in abandon Down the wet street.*

BOYS and Girls

When Heavenly Blossoms Came to Town

BY MARGARET T. APPLGARTH

(Concluded from last week)

MISS Missionary clutched her arm: "Oh, but Mrs. Wang, I'm afraid that was dreadful mistake, for surely you know that smallpox is catching, and if Kom Loi slept with your neighbor's children when they will probably all get it, too! He ought to be kept in a room by himself, if the rest of you want to keep well."

Mrs. Wang laughed. "What curious notions you honorable foreigners have! Nobody here believes as you do! You see our ancestors before us all knew what we know, that it is the gods who send us smallpox because we have diseased them."

Miss Missionary groaned, and her heart felt as heavy as a ton of coal! For all that town there was only one other person who knew any better, and that was another Miss Missionary. But neither of them was a doctor, or understood how to treat such a dangerous disease. In fact there was no doctor anywhere for hundreds of miles around, she did quite the wisest thing: she hurried home and wrote, to the nearest doctor, asking what was to be done; then the two Miss Missionaries looked up smallpox in the encyclopedia, and waded through long, tiresome paragraphs trying to find some sensible suggestions for Mrs. Wang.

Toward evening Miss Missionary hurried over to the Wangs' home, and there in the street she saw something that made her throat feel as if she had swallowed a huge marble, for outside the front gate stood dear Mrs. Wang waving a tiny blue jacket which belonged to Kom Loi as she chanted: "Come back! Oh do come back! Come back, little lost soul, oh do come back!"

Over and over she wailed the words, for it was sunset time, and she firmly believed that her little son had lost one of his three souls, and that it was wandering around in a lonesome way looking for a home to spend the night. So she begged it to creep back into Kom Loi's little jacket, and make him well again. "Come back! Come back!" she wailed, waving the tiny coat enticingly, and the people who passed in the street shook their heads mournfully: "Call louder!" they said, "call louder!" So she called a little louder, until it seemed to Miss Missionary that as long as she lived she could hear those heartbreaking cries: "Come back, little lost soul, oh do come back!"

She gently led the exhausted mother inside the house, and began offering her suggestions.

"Oh, but we have had our village doctor since you were here last," Mrs. Wang explained, "and he has pierced Kom Loi in twenty places to let out the pain, and he has brewed a wonderful medicine made of grasshoppers' legs and tiger bones and coffin nails, so that he can grow stronger. You aren't a doctor, so how could you suggest anything wiser than this?"

So Miss Missionary trudged wearily back to her own home, praying that Kom Loi might recover and that heavenly blossoms might not spread through the town; but the day before when foolish Mrs. Wang had played her trick on the idols she had helped spread smallpox herself, for of course her neighbor's five little children all caught it, and before long grown-up people fell sick, too, until almost any evening you could have seen heartbroken mothers waving tiny jackets at sunset time, begging little lost souls to come back to their children. "Come back!" they would plead, "oh do come back!"

I know that the Friend of Little Children must have felt especially sorry for those anxious mothers and for our two Miss Missionaries, who had big black circles under their eyes from lack of sleep and overwork.

"Oh why aren't we doctors?" sighed the two schoolteacher missionaries — for what was the good of being teachers when all their pupils were so sick?

Yet all the time help was coming to them from over the hills. But 200 miles is 200 miles, and since there were no trains or automobiles the doctor and the nurse were being carried in sedan chairs

A Chinese Age Contest

(All the answers are words ending in "age." Correct answers will be given next week.)

1. In what age does the Chinese grandfather's house stand?
2. At what age did the Chinese grandfather marry the Chinese grandmother?
3. What age shows that he was brave?
4. What age did he worship in the gorgeous temple?
5. What age did he fear the evil spirits would inflict on him?
6. With what age are elderly persons revered in China?
7. What age does the poor little slave girl meekly endure?
8. What age do Chinese birds wear?
9. What age must the Chinese missionary travel around with?
10. What age was the house the villagers built for him to live in?
11. What age did he use to write to Baptists at home about his village?
12. What age will the Chinese grandfather reach if he lives long enough?

by coolies, hurrying as fast as they could.

After the doctors arrived and set to work, the people in town were worried enough to watch their strange new methods seriously, and you could have heard families talking things over: "These foreign devils treat heavenly blossoms in a strange way," they said, "they want to scratch us all on the arm! What nonsense! Yet they say there is a town just over the hill from us where almost everybody was scratched on the arm, and none of them ever had smallpox, while the people who refused to be scratched on the arm broke out all over with heavenly blossoms!"

"Then let us be scratched," said some families, while others said fiercely: "No, never, never! Why should we change and do things the foreigner's way?"

But sad Mrs. Wang marched all her children up to the doctor and rolled up their sleeves, saying: "You may try your strange scratching on them, honorable sir, for now that my precious little Kom Loi has slipped away to his ancestors I could not stand it to have another child die."

The next year when heavenly blossoms came to town again, of course it was the people who had been vaccinated who did not get sick, so one by one many of the others shamefacedly called on Miss Missionary and said: "The next time your honorable Dr. Scratch-on-the-Arm returns, remember to tell him that the sleeves of our jackets will be rolled up all ready for him!"

But you may be sure that when this "Dr. Scratch-on-the-Arm" rode his 200 miles home he found endless patients waiting for him, enough to keep him busy for years and years to come; so he never again got back to that faraway town; and this very minute, while you and I sit in Sunday school, it is sunset time over in China and you could see many a sad little mother waving a tiny jacket as she calls down the shadowy street, "Come back, little lost soul, oh do come back!"

And because you and I know there are no such things as little lost souls, why can't we answer those mothers' cries ourselves by giving and giving and giving until a doctor all their own could go to live in that town, and scratch them all on the arm and keep heavenly blossoms away forever?

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

FURTHER COMMENT ON "THE STANDARD CHURCH"

The article, "Why Not a Standard Church?" published on this page, Oct. 2, brought forth the following interesting comment from Rev. F. A. Hayward, executive secretary of the Federated Baptist churches of Indianapolis. The plan discussed by Mr. Hayward was used by the Indianapolis city office in its planning commission. "A Commission of Baptist city planning was set up by the Federated Baptist churches of Indianapolis. It included plans for enlargement of Baptist enterprises. Incidentally it involved certain descriptive understandings regarding our own churches in operation. The commission searched in vain for a 'Baptist Church Measurement' and set up the following called 'The Rule of Seven'.

1. The church content.
 - Membership of the church
 - Average attendance at the church school
 - Types of membership and worshippers at church services
 2. Operating program, fourfold.
 - Evangelism
 - Religious education
 - Stewardship and missions
 - Recreational program and activities
 3. Property efficiency.
 - Location
 - Arrangement and outward upkeep
 - Appeal to the parish
 - Condition and furnishings
 4. The parish.
 - Estimated population and prospect
 - Area-boundary lines
 - Denominational competition
 - Community types of cooperation
 5. The organic church.
 - Department of religious education:
 - Work among men and boys
 - Work among young people
 - Music and musical grouping
 - Missionary instruction and expression
 - Social life and programs
 6. Finances and the church.
 - Current expense budget
 - Current missionary budget
 - Physical valuation of all property
 - Property indebtedness on church and parsonage
 7. Problem program of the church.
 - State frankly the problems not only as they indicate present conditions but anticipate the situation for the next five or ten years.
- Note: In any standard these needs under 'The Rule of Seven' must be considered. The plan of markings can be easily devised on the basis of this listings."

POPULAR OUTDOOR SERVICES

A novel feature was introduced on Sunday nights during August by Rev. S. W. Powell, pastor of First church, Anderson, Ind. The east lawn of the church was electrically lighted and a special platform arranged for outdoor services. The services attracted large congregations, many of whom were non-church attendants. It was an unusual gathering for a religious meeting. Three or four hundred chairs in the foreground were filled with worshippers. All about the edge of the lawn parking space was provided for automobiles and every available inch of space was taken up. Many of the people remained in their cars and participated in the services. Unable to find parking space, other machines were lined on both sides of the street and people stood on the sidewalks and in the open alley and others were turned away for lack of room. In addition to this great company of people, the number of auditors was greatly augmented by the numbers who sat on their porches and were within the range of the preacher's voice. Conversions took place at every service.

SOUND ADVICE

"There is a fine spiritual culture in weekly payment. The concrete act of signing a check, enclosing money and putting one's name on an envelope, makes one think in a tangible way of his church and its privileges at least once a week, and has a definite spiritual reaction upon the payer. But be not unloving or intolerant; some are situated so that they cannot get this weekly blessing, and because of necessary absences from the services, or other reasons, pay monthly, quarterly or semi-annually. If they pay one instalment in advance each time, without waiting for the treasurer to remind them, they do not contribute to the borrowing of money on interest chargeable to the whole church, or add to the labor and anxiety of treasurers who do business for others without remuneration."

The above is a bit of advice from one who has served many times as treasurer of current expense and mission funds of churches and has been embarrassed by slow and delinquent payment of pledges. The paragraph is reprinted from the bulletin of the College church, Hillsdale, Mich.

REAL PROGRESS

"At the recent meeting of the Bhamo Baptist Association in Burma, 5000 Kachins gathered. With splendid speeches they discussed their problems of church activities and industry and planned their work. These people did not even have a written language thirty-three years ago."—The Baptist Record.

A HELPFUL SUGGESTION

"Rev. Robert H. Pratt, pastor of the Evansville church, is planning a series of five-minute talks on various aspects of the denominational program to be given as preludes to his morning sermons. This is a fine suggestion and we pass it on to our brethren in the ministry, suggesting that this method should be helpful in the presentation of our missionary tasks. All the departments of Mr. Pratt's church have held up in fine shape during the summer."—Reprinted from the Wisconsin Baptist.

GOOD WORK

The Scarbro church, Raleigh Association, W. Va., Rev. R. B. Nelson, pastor, with not quite 200 members wins first place in the reading contest in the state. This is a church in a mining center, suffering under poor equipment and an unfortunate building location, yet achieving no mean place in Christ's kingdom. That information brings inspiration in seen in the acceptance of its share of the missionary task and more, and the payment each month of one-twelfth of the amount pledged.

A SIGNIFICANT YEAR.

Here is another church which gives more for others than for self. Last year the First church of Pasadena, Calif., Rev. John M. Dean, pastor, took in $28,233 for current expenses and gave for benevolences $36,832. Of the latter amount, over $33,000 was given through the Northern Baptist Convention as distributable funds.

This church has just had the most significant year of its history. During the past twelve months, the stately new house of worship was completed and dedicated. The church also dedicated a handsome new Sunday-school unit known as the Washington Street chapel and organized and developed a splendid Sunday school at that point.

Two workers were added to the church staff during the year, and 26 new members were received into the church. The total membership is now above 1800.

Among Ourselves

West China Letter

By JOE TAYLOR

THIS letter, I shall be daring and give the readers of THE BAPTIST an opportunity to read what at least one Christian is thinking and saying on a subject that is in the fore in this country. It would make for mutual understanding between America and China if religious weeklies would print occasionally articles from the pens of thoughtful Chinese. In this way, the religious papers would in a small measure be doing for colleges and universities in the United States ought to be doing in a systematic fashion. What is needed is an exchange of thought among nations of the world. Thus misconceptions would be removed and the ground cleared for the building up of national good-will.

A Burning Question

Therefore give my space to Mr. Mark Lee, who in the May issue of the Recorder made some pertinent remarks on "Registration of Christian Schools." Remember that this is one of the burning public questions at present troubling the people of China, one of the heads of the anti-Christian movement, then read what Mr. Lee writes: "Mission schools should be registered if they be allowed to retain their distinctive Christian character, but not otherwise. Mission schools should as far as possible comply with requirements number four (If the school or college board of directors or managers, a majority should be Chinese.) by making a majority of the board of trustees Chinese."

Christian citizens should have the right to organize and establish educational institutions requiring the study of the Bible as a part of Christian education. Their conception of education, as it is, the development of Christian character, they should be as free to give their ideas of what constitutes an education as other groups are to follow their ideas. No one group of citizens should be allowed to dictate to any other what constitutes an education.

The ministry of education has simply set up standards that are academic in nature, and should not attempt to pass questions of religion.

The ministry of education should not attempt to promulgate any regulation the effect of which would interfere with complete religious liberty or place disabilities upon citizens who for conscientious reasons are unable to conform to the regulation. Such a regulation would be contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitutional provision which guarantees to all citizens of the republic religious liberty, and would therefore be null and void.

"In the desire to place foreign supported and controlled institutions under Chinese law, we must not prejudice or jeopardize the religious rights of Chinese Christians. If one minister of education be held competent to say that voluntary religious instruction is permissible while required instruction is prohibited, what is to prevent the next minister of education from prohibiting voluntary instruction? Once concede the competency of a minister of education to pass on religious questions and you have made it possible for an official of the government by regulation to deprive citizens of their constitutional rights.

"Most nations have recognized the place of Christian schools in their educational systems. They have an important place in the promotion of education in China. As the government institutions become stronger and better supported, they will eventually take over the initiative and responsibility for the education of the people, but even then Christian institutions will have a distinct field of work. When Christian schools are managed and controlled by Chinese, much of the present opposition to them will be modified. It would be a mistake, in my opinion, to take any steps that might impair their Christian position."

Religious Education

This writer undoubtedly points out some weak spots in the regulations of the ministry of education that were promulgated last November. He is on safe ground in contending that no one group of citizens should be allowed to dictate to any other group what constitutes an education. The field of education should be left free and untrammelled in order that experiments may be made and new methods evolved. "Hands off!" should be the cry of all those who are interested in the progress of education. No country has arrived at the goal and there are stretches of ground yet to be covered. China will gain if its schools can be saved from the crippling hand of a bureaucracy. The value of religious instruction in a school should be tested before the course is ruled out. I have no brief for required religious instruction, yet a great deal of good has resulted from the courses that have hitherto been required in the Christian schools in West China. It is only fair to say that harm has resulted from obliging students to study some of the subjects that appear in the courses of study under the name of religious knowledge. But the fault is in the particular courses rather than in the whole scheme. The truth is that even the most advanced schools in this country have much to learn about the whole subject of religious instruction, and they are learning.

The anti-Christian movement charges Christian schools with denationalizing the pupils because of the teaching in the courses in religious knowledge. They say that the teachings of Jesus tend to deaden patriotic feelings and thus pave the way for the entrance of the "imperialistic" nations. This smells of Russia, yet I do not undertake to lay it at the door of the bolsheviks. There is at present a wave of lawlessness spreading over and through China. Old, well-defined customs and sanctions are swept aside and "freedom" to do as one pleases is demanded. To bring about this era of so-called liberty all religion is set at naught and license rules. The anti-Christian movement is only part of a campaign to destroy religion and law and bring in an era of anarchy. In some parts of this country, judging from the reports of conditions, the campaign seems to have succeeded. What is needed is more religion, not less.

Opening at Linfield

LINFIELD college is in its seventieth year of continuous work and the registration of students is exactly equal to the total for the whole of the first semester of last year; 277 now, means over 300 for this year. A total of 291 last year was the record attendance at Linfield.

The opening address was delivered by Rev. Raymond B. Culver who graduated from Linfield college in 1914, later receiving his doctor's degree from Yale university. Doctor Culver was the student Y. M. C. A. secretary for the New England district for several years and this month began the same work in the Northwest, relieving Mr. Gale Seaman, another Baptist and graduate of Denison university, of a portion of the work which he has done on the Pacific coast for many years. Mr. W. Lester Adams, another Baptist, who graduated from Linfield college in 1912, is the executive secretary of the Y. M. C. A. for the Northwest.

The first chapel address was given by Rev. Kenneth Scott Latourette, professor of missions at Yale Divinity school. This was followed by an appropriate address by the pastor, Dr. W. E. Henry, on "The Investment of the Fighting Spirit." He declared that the aim of Linfield college is not to kill the fighting spirit which exists in all of us but to direct it against those things which tend to undermine and destroy in our own lives and in the world in which we live.

Increase in Endowment

The endowment of the college has been increased by $106,163.96 secured by the sale of one of the lots in Spokane deeded to the institution by Mrs. Frances E. R. Linfield. The lot netted $70,775.97 and this amount brought from the General Education Board $35,387.99 in accord with our contract with that organization. Mrs. Linfield surrendered her life interest in the proceeds of this sale. Three parcels of the Linfield gift remain unsold. They are valued at approximately $300,000 with mortgages thereon amounting to $65,000.

Pastors of West Washington Convention held a conference at the Burton assembly grounds, Sept. 15-17. Each pastor was expected to bring two laymen with him.

On Saturday afternoon and evening, Sept. 25, Dr. A. M. Bailey and the officers of his church held a retreat at the Burton assembly grounds. This is the second year of a custom which has been found decidedly profitable in the life of the church. Doctor and Mrs. Bailey recently entertained the Baptist ministers of Seattle and their wives at luncheon, thus beginning the year's work of the ministers' association.

Rev. R. R. Mulholland has resigned at Riddle, Ore., to accept the pastorate of the church at Klamath Falls. His successor at Riddle is Rev. Earle L. Baker who is succeeded in his pastorate at Prineville by Rev. S. L. Boyce from Lacombe. Rev. A. J. Ware has moved from Helix, Ore., to Hermiston.

Rev. Frank B. Matthews is on his new field at Roseburg, Ore. He comes from University church, Seattle, Wash., where he erected the first unit of a new plant.

Rev. John S. Stump, church edifice secretary of the Home Mission Society, is touring the West in the interests of our new building enterprises. Sept. 20 he was in McMinnville in conference with Dr. W. E. Henry and the representatives of his church.

Series of Sermons

For the past four years Dr. C. Oscar Johnson, First church, Tacoma, Wash., upon returning from his vacation has preached a series of sermons on phases of home and family life. This month he has begun a series on "Ancient Families and Modern Days." Subjects include: "Learning to Live Together," "The Family and the Neighborhood," "Family Prayer," "The Family and Business," "An Old-Fashioned Courtship," "The Boy Problem," "Matrimonial Mistakes," "Family Reunions."

Dr. A. M. Bailey, First church, Seattle, likewise begins the year with a series of sermons, designed to bring his hearers into the atmosphere of New Testament experience. He is preaching a three-months' series on the twelve apostles who walked and talked with Jesus in the days of his flesh.

California Letter

By GEORGE E. BURLINGAME

The Comforts of Home

CALIFORNIA has added two more splendid army and navy "Y" buildings to the great structure opened at San Diego two years ago for the thousands of service men stationed there. The edifice completed at San Pedro (Los Angeles) last month is said to be the handsomest and best-appointed building of its kind in America. It is five stories high, 162 by 220 feet, of South European architecture. I. W. Larimore is executive secretary, with a staff of forty-nine helpers. Nearly 600 men can be cared for overnight. San Francisco has also dedicated a fine new army and navy "Y" on the water front facing the dock where the ships debark their men.

A Late Arrival

Martinez, on the south shore of Carquinez straits at the mouth of the Sacramento river, is one of the oldest settlements in California. The first Baptist missionary who labored in the "golden state", Rev. Osgood C. Wheeler, must have trod its main street as he traveled from San Francisco to Sacramento and to other towns where he preached and organized churches. Yet as far as the writer knows, Martinez has never had a Baptist church until this year. The Thousand Oaks Baptist church of Berkeley (itself only five years old) has undertaken a mission in this important county-seat town of 7000 people. A provisional organization has been effected with twenty-five charter members, and thirty-five other Baptists are listed for prospective membership. It is planned to complete the organization of the church before Thanksgiving. Prof. John W. Johnson of the department of theology in the Berkeley Baptist Divinity school has accepted an invitation to serve as acting pastor. A statement given to the press by the church officers assures the community that "the Martinez Baptists expect to maintain a high type of reverent and helpful service, and invite all who wish, to worship with them."

Public Questions on the Ballot

California is facing a furious state-wide battle in the November elections in defense of the Wright law for the state enforcement of the federal Volstead law. The adoption of the Wright law by popular vote on a referendum called by the liquor people was one of the greatest triumphs for reform ever achieved in the state. This year the "wets" have forced the issue of repeal on the ballot, relying on the prevailing agitation against prohibition to aid them in breaking down state enforcement thus discrediting the eighteenth amendment. The Anti-Saloon League, with an able and skilful Baptist minister, Rev. Creed W. Gawthrop among its executives, is planning thorough precinct organization and repeated canvasses of the electorate for the defeat of the pending measure and the retention of the Wright law. The Hearst press, which has quite a coterie of organs over the state, is aligned openly with the "wets". The most amazing political development in relation to the issue is the capture of the democratic state convention by the "drys" who, by the narrow margin of three votes, put through at 3 a. m. a resolution in defense of the Wright law and opposing its repeal. The victorious majority represents William J. McAdoo of Los Angeles who is fighting for his political life in his party in California this year. The republican nominee for governor, C. C. Young of Berkeley, is a "fighting dry" and is certain of election. A noisy and aggressive crowd of sports has placed on the ballot by initiative a proposal to legalize race-track gambling on the pari-mutuel system, but the vigor and strength of the organized opposition all over the state bids fair to head off this evil thing.

Doctor Brougher Goes East

A year ago the denomination was awaiting the launching of the "Play Ball" campaign which is now history, in which Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, then pastor of Temple church, Los Angeles, toured the country and talked cooperation and courtesy to 160,000 Baptists, preparing the way for the irenic and epochal meeting at Washington. Now, as president of the Northern Baptist Convention, Doctor Brougher is again preparing for a tour, less exacting and briefer. For the sake of the denomination, First church, Oakland, is releasing its pastor for two Sundays in November to attend the meeting of the executive committee and fulfill a series of speaking engagements. His itinerary as announced from the New York office is as follows: Pendleton, Ore., Nov. 9; Yakima, Wash., Nov. 10; Spokane, Wash., Nov. 11; Butte, Mont., Nov. 12; Minneapolis, Minn., Nov. 14; Chicago, Ill., Nov. 15, 17; Des Moines, Iowa, Nov. 16; Omaha, Neb., Nov. 19; Colorado Springs, Colo., Nov. 21; Denver, Colo., Nov. 22.

The Baptist White House

A two-story frame house, formerly a two-flat residence, at 530 Twenty-first St., Oakland, now serves as the busy office of the president of the Northern Baptist Convention who is also pastor of First church with 1300 members. Reorganization and expansion have been going on since August, and a well-correlated program of work embracing all lines of church activity is in operation. During September a continuous stream of accessions was received, and on Oct. 3 Doctor rougher gave the hand of fellowship to forty-two new members, with five others approved for baptism. Thirty per cent of all the Baptists in the churches ofameda county are in First church, Oakland. In a survey of First church, made a year or more ago, it was revealed that while a large number of additions had come to the church in twelve months only 29 per cent were by confession of faith, the remainder coming from other churches. This fact is of general application and should not be overlooked in our plans for evangelism. While the conservation of Baptist church members of great importance, the real difference between hospitalization and regeneration is infinite; and no church should be content merely to report "additions" that will show on other church letters as losses by letter . . . by erasure". The additions which are most satisfying and creditable are those described in Acts 17, "Day by day the Lord added to their number those whom he was saving."

Gordon Lays Down His Load

After Dr. Charles F. Aked sailed on Lord's peace ship to get the boys out of the trenches before Christmas, leaving vacant the pulpit of the First Congregational church of San Francisco, a mediocre interval was ended when Dr. James L. Gordon came from Washington, D. C., in 1919. His ministry has been highly sensational, and he made his church famous for the clever advertising, the startling topics, the generous use of the printed sermon and the variety of musical and other features attached to his services. It was here that the late Luther Burbank avowed his "infidelity" shortly before his death. The present secretary of the navy, Judge Wilbur, was long the teacher of a large Sunday class while on the state supreme bench, and he retains his membership in Doctor Gordon's church. No other church in the entire Bay region approximates the enormous amount of advertising done by this church, the Saturday display ads often running to thirty column inches in each of several papers.

Doctor Gordon took his congregation and his city by surprise when, on Sept. 12, he read his resignation, effective Dec. 1. He stated that after forty years in the ministry he felt that he had earned the opportunity to fulfil a dream of many years in a larger ministry of authorship and lecturing. He will continue to live in California and will devote a large portion of his time to writing. His retirement leaves this Bay cities community of a million people with but one active minister of national fame, and he, a Baptist.

Detroit Baptist Doings

By ALBERT H. FINN

I FEAR I have neglected THE BAPTIST in the multiplicity of duties at home. Since Labor day and before, Baptists of the metropolitan area have been active.

Sept. 12 the beautiful new edifice of Dexter Boulevard church was dedicated. This church originated in a little mission on Russell st. on the east side years ago. It developed into a feeble church known as Olivet Baptist. The Woodward Avenue church offered a beautiful site and building on Ferry ave. at Hastings st. which was gladly accepted, and the name was changed to Ferry Avenue Baptist church; there it developed into a real church. The neighborhood changed into a Jewish section, the property was sold for a synagogue and a new site purchased on East Grand boulevard, near Beaubien st. Here a tabernacle type of structure readily adapted into a business building was erected, and the name changed to the Maranatha Baptist church. Again a rapidly changing neighborhood, change of pastors, etc., brought about another move. A site was purchased in a new northwest residential district of the better type on Dexter boulevard at Davison and Rev. W. W. McMaster of Hamilton, Ont., was called as pastor. The new building is modernized Gothic, in brick and stone. It has a wonderful Bible school and social work plant, a pipe organ, and is artistic throughout. Dr. Daniel F. Rittenhouse of Columbus, Ohio, preached the dedication sermon. The weather was unpropitious but the audiences were large and enthusiastic. Dexter Boulevard church already is taking a prominent part in denominational life.

Sept. 13 Baptist ministers of greater Detroit assembled at Dexter Boulevard church for their first conference of the fall and winter. It was a joyous and helpful affair. Doctor Rittenhouse spoke with power. The ladies of the church served a delightful and generous luncheon.

CLASS OF 1926 GRADUATED FROM NORTHERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, AND FACULTY

In the evening Baptists of the city met in the church for denominational night, to inspect the new building and to rejoice with the brethren there in the happy consummation of their building enterprise. Doctor Rittenhouse again gave an inspiring message.

Tuesday evening, the new organ, a gift of Mr. and Mrs. Duryea, members of the church, was dedicated with an organ recital, largely attended by an appreciative audience. Mrs. Frederick Reinhart, organist and director of music, is developing one of the best choirs in the city.

Farmington, the oldest Baptist church in the Detroit Association, celebrated its centenary Sept. 15-16. This church has had a varied career. Several times the village nearly expired, but always there was a faithful remnant until today it is a rapidly growing suburb of Detroit, and the church reflects its environment. Rev. E. W. Palmer is pastor, and the church seems assured of continued growth and power.

Bethel Lays Corner Stone.

Sept. 12 Bethel church, over sixty years old, formerly First German-American Baptist church, laid the corner-stone of its new house of worship on Mack and Iroquois aves. The former meeting house has been sold and is now occupied by the New Hope church, negro. The new building will be one of the largest Baptist churches in Detroit. Frank Kaiser is pastor.

The Halsey church is in the midst of a building enterprise under the leadership of Pastor Sims. Halsey is a growing community north of Royal Oak and east of Birmingham. The new building will be ready for occupancy by Christmas.

The Blessed Hope church is a new congregation to be welcomed into our fellowship. It is located on Puritan ave. in the Fenkel ave. district.

Rev. H. R. Waldo of Indianapolis has accepted a call to the Carmel Avenue church and is already on the field.

Dr. F. H. Divine is leading the Highland Park church in a financial campaign for the purpose of building a greatly needed new edifice, which will be located on Second boulevard at Ford ave.

Building operations have begun on the new building, a first unit, for the Ferndale church, the new site being on Pinecrest drive.

Work will soon begin on the beautiful new house of worship for the Grand River Avenue church, located on Grand River ave. and Wells, near Monnier road. This is a rapidly developing residential community, inadequately served by a chapel which has been occupied for nearly three years.

The big event for Baptists of the metropolitan area is the centenary of the Michigan Association, now known as the Detroit Association. Dr. Mark F. Sanborn is moderator and First church, of which he is pastor, will be the entertaining church. The program will cover three days. An exhibit of historical books, pamphlets, pictures, records, etc., will be given.

Cortland, N. Y., Association

BY G. A. FAIRBANK

The Annual Meeting

THE ninety-ninth meeting of Cortland Association was held with the Groton church Sept. 28-29. A kindly welcome was given to the delegates by the pastor, Mark Rich, and his people. Rev. G. L. Cutten, pastor of First church, Cortland, was moderator. Rev. W. B. McNinch, the new pastor of the Cincinnati and Pitcher churches, led the devotional periods. His general theme was "Footprints of Jesus." Various topics treated were: "Obedience," "Dependence," "Prayer," "Self-mastery" and "Consecration." The annual sermon was preached by Rev. A. H. McKnight of Homer on "Jesus' Test of Discipleship." It was a plain, practical sermon, showing how Jesus expects love to be shown by his disciples under all circumstances.

Tuesday afternoon, Rev. M. J. Congdon presented the work of the New York Civic League; Rev. L. P. Tucker, the work of the Anti-Saloon League. Following these, Rev. Russell Moore of Marathon led a discussion on associational problems and Rev. E. B. Russell presented a plea for a larger financial backing of the Upstate Baptist Home for Children near Oneonta—the home is just a little more than one year old and is already full, with a number of children on the waiting list. Rev. H. Clarke Colebrook, general director of the state convention, gave an inspirational address urging men to get into touch with the Source of all power. On Tuesday evening the boys and girls of the D. V. B. S. of Groton gave a dramatic sketch of "Queen Esther," under the direction of Mrs. F. R. Mangang and Mrs. Fred Long of Groton. Following this, Rev. Robert Beattie, associate pastor of First Presbyterian church of Ithaca, gave a thoughtful address on "Capitalization of Life."

Reports, business, open discussion of the state convention and the work of the association occupied the major part of Wednesday forenoon, the rest of the time being consumed with a report of the pastors' and laymen's conference held at Keuka college in August, by Rev. W. L. Barnes of Summer Hill, and "Impressions of the Northern Baptist Convention at Washington", by a number of the brethren who attended.

The woman's hour was at 2 p. m. Wednesday, Mrs. F. R. Mangang of Groton, vice-president of the woman's society, presiding in the absence of the president, Mrs. W. D. Shuler of McGraw. The speaker was Rev. J. H. Cope of Haka, Burma. After the intermission, Mr. Cope gave another address which was followed by Rev. W. E. Witter of Rochester, formerly of Assam, and Rev. G. M. Reid, pastor of First church of Auburn.

The evening session was divided into two parts, both parts being held around the dinner table. Over eighty young people gathered around the table in the Methodist church where the banquet was served by the ladies of the Congregational church, Rev. W. E. Witter, speaker. About the same number of older folk gathered around the tables in the Baptist church and listened with interest to an address by Rev. G. M. Reid.

Rev. Mark Rich of Groton was elected moderator for the coming year, J. W. Livingston of Marathon reelected clerk, and Rev. Russell Moore of Marathon was chosen as preacher of the next annual sermon. The association plans to hold its 100th meeting with the Homer church in connection with the centennial of that church.

A Resignation and D. V. B. S.

Rev. Ward Lusk has resigned the Milan church at Lecke to accept the pastorate of the church at Venice. He will conclude his pastorate when he will have completed three years of service with the church Nov. 1. The spiritual life of the church has been enriched by both Mr. and Mrs. Lusk who have taught high standards of Christian living. The church property has also been improved during the past year at a cost of about $1300, most of which has been paid. This church conducted a D. V. B. S. under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. Lusk.

The church at Etna also conducted a D. V. B. S. under the auspices of the Sunday school. These, with the five mentioned in our last letter, make seven communities having D. V. B. S. with Baptist leadership.

A Virile Old Church Celebrates

First church of Cortland is getting old in years but is still strong and virile and observed its 125th anniversary Oct. 2-3. It started Saturday afternoon with an old-fashioned party in the parlors of the church in which a number of dresses of bygone days were on exhibition, some on living models. Old-fashioned songs were sung and old furniture, including the pulpit set used in the first church building, was out for inspection. Sunday morning, Rev. J. C. Hendrickson of Stamford, Conn., who was pastor of the church for about eight years prior to the present pastor, Rev. G. L. Cutten, was the preacher of the anniversary sermon on the theme, "The Changing World and the Unchanging Christ." At the close an informal reception was held at which many of the numerous friends of the former pastor gave him a cordial greeting. At the Sunday-school session a brief history of the church was read by Mrs. James Jenman, who has been a member of the church for seventy years. She said the church was organized in 1801 with sixteen charter members and had no regular pastor until 1807 when Alfred Bennett became pastor. The first building which was dedicated in 1811, was later moved about four miles south to Blodgett Mills and has been used as a Baptist church for many years. It is thus the oldest building in the county to be used as a church. In 1827 the church mutually divided into three groups, one remaining in Cortland, one organizing

The great task of the Red Cross, now that the period of emergency relief is about over, is to bring the 18,000 broken-down homes of the less fortunate back to normal, to see the sick and injured restored to health by the best medical skill and care, to keep the children in school and the young people in college, and to restore the homes of those who lost all. This is an exacting and technical work which will take several years.

PASTOR C. R. OSBORN at Morgan Park, Chicago, has a young people's club which boosts the Sunday evening service and holds a meeting afterward in some home to discuss important phases of church work and Christian life problems. It numbers about thirty-five members. It puts on parties occasionally for special groups such as orphans from the children's home, Mexican children and others. It canvassed the whole church for registration and voting.

DURING OCTOBER, Dr. W. H. Geistweit gave to his church at Dayton, Ohio, a series of sermons on "Some Torch-Bearers of History".

THE BIG BUSINESS MEN'S CLASS in First church, Kansas City, Mo., has enrolled eighty-eight new members in the last three weeks.

CHICAGO MINISTERS' CONFERENCE had a good attendance, Oct. 11, and discussed the subject of qualifications for ordination. A notable visitor was Dr. John McGuire of Rangoon, Burma. A snappy difference of opinion arose concerning the present political situation in Illinois, some thinking that temperance people ought to support Mr. Smith for the senate of the United States and others arguing for Mr. Magill. Smith is the republican nominee whose campaign contributions were investigated by the Reed committee. Magill is running as an independent republican as a protest against the manner of Smith's nomination. Mr.

Brennan, the democratic candidate, is wet. Smith is reputed to favor the Volstead law. Magill is uncompromisingly dry. The tangle is one of the worst in Illinois politics.

MR. R. F. JUDSON has been called to be director of young people's work and minister of education for First church, Kansas City, Mo.

TABERNACLE CHURCH, Milwaukee, has 365 members, of whom 165 came into the church during the present pastorate of Rev. Rollo C. Speer.

"WHAT YOU HAVE—USE IT OR LOSE IT," was the subject of the Sunday evening sermon of Pastor John E. Arblaster, Washington, Pa., Oct. 10.

SANDUSKY STREET CHURCH, Pittsburgh, has called but two pastors in the last fifty-six years. Dr. B. F. Woodburn served thirty-six years, and the present pastor, Dr. A. J. Bonsall, has served twenty years and still continues.

ARTHUR E. COWLEY

REV. ARTHUR E. COWLEY of First church, Lebanon, Ind., is specially successful with young people. It is unusual, for the church not to be filled on Sunday, evenings, with young people making up more than 50 per cent of the audience. Referring to the "revolt of youth", Mr. Cowley said: "Adam and Eve were the only old couple who did not think that the young folks were worse than they were when they were children! Every generation feels that the oncoming one is on the toboggan slide for a quick journey downward. Every generation has seen a revolt of youth, and in such an age as we are living in there are many aspects of the revolt that are encourag-ing. Many would feel that their preach-ing and teaching had failed if youth could live satisfied in the world as it is organ-ized today. Charles Jefferson has pointed out that 'it took the young men under twenty to get the world out of the mess that the men over twenty got it into in the last great war.' No wonder they are not enthusiastic about compulsory mili-tary drill."

MR. HERBERT W. GRANT, director of religious education for First church of Lansing, Mich., was ordained to the Christian ministry Oct. 1. Rev. Donald T. Grey of Olivet church, Lansing, was elected moderator of the council. Dr. M. P. Boynton of Woodlawn church, Chi-cago, preached the ordination sermon. The invocation was given by Rev. Warren Jackson, Tecumseh; charge to candidate, by Rev. Earl F. Adams, Hillsdale; charge to church, by Rev. M. F. Ashbrook, Adrian; ordination prayer, by Dr. Ralph W. Hobbs, First church, Lansing. Mr. Grant is a graduate of Rochester Theo-logical seminary, '26.

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel bldg., Chicago.

"Tonight we have a little love-feast arranged. You can listen in without extra cost. Our friends are waiting here in the studio. The first is our iceman. His name is Mr. J. Frost White and he is a busy man as all the world knows. This is Mr. White:

'I usually climb about 479 flights of stairs every day and deliver from 15,000 to 25,000 pounds of ice. Then after I have watered and fed the horses, walked ten blocks home, spaded a little in the garden, watered the lawn and romped an hour with the kids, I am ready to sit down and enjoy THE BAPTIST. I find it restful.'

"And this is our friend Mrs. Grace Vaughan of Racine, Wis. Racine has a lot of boosters for the paper. Mrs. Vaughan: 'I enjoy THE BAPTIST very much. I not only read it for my own enjoyment but use many of its articles or parts of articles in our meetings to inform others.' This is highly commendable. The more information, the better. It is the basis of interest and fellowship.

"Mrs. Louis Gore of Beloit, Wis., says: 'I shall not delay sending in my subscription any longer by waiting to get a new subscriber. I am enclosing check for $3 for THE BAPTIST and Missions. We appreciate the desire to get the new subscription and the prompt renewal. You know every renewal and new subscription means added service rendered by the paper.'

"Pastor A. L. Drake of Waukesha, Wis., is always boosting. He declares: 'To my way of thinking, we are getting a denominational paper full of news, peppy, and up to date in every particular. Nowhere else can we get so much for our money.' We think Brother Drake has good judgment and the long list of his church members who take THE BAPTIST seems to indicate that they agree with their pastor. Everybody wins and everybody is happy.

"Mrs. May Huntington of Rochester, N. Y., in asking to have her address changed, writes: 'I should hate to lose a single copy as I usually read it from cover to cover. I do not see how any good Baptist can do without our paper.' Well, come to think of it, she is right. How can he? People who try to get on without their denominational paper are likely to be provincial. Provincialism is not due to geographical location but to a state of mind. Mrs. Huntington enjoys a worldwide fellowship in THE BAPTIST while living in one of the most beautiful cities in the U. S. A.

"And here is a voice from Missouri. You know the Missouri slogan, 'Show Me'. Well, L. M. Short of Columbia says: 'Enclosed find check for $2.50 for another year's subscription to THE BAPTIST. I have read all the issues of the past year with a great deal of pleasure and interest. The whole paper in all its departments appeals to a progressive forward-looking member of the Baptist denomination.' Thank you, Brother Short, for 'them kind words'. This is the key: 'I HAVE READ' and 'FORWARD-LOOKING'. Think it over.

"Edwin Phelps, general secretary of the B. Y. P. U. of A. taught a class of 300 at Ocean Park last summer. Eighty-five local units of B. Y. P. U. were represented. In the written survey of this group it was discovered that thirty-five of these units had THE BAPTIST and made some use of the special materials found on Mr. Phelps' page in the paper. Does the leader of your B. Y. P. U. take THE BAPTIST?

"The office boy will recite a little rhyme entitled 'Sunshine and Music'. He says that in his opinion people would have these golden qualities if they read THE BAPTIST more:

'A laugh is just like sunshine, it freshens all the day;
It tips the peak of life with light, and drives the clouds away;
The soul grows glad that hears it, and feels its courage strong;
A laugh is just like sunshine for cheering folks along.

'A laugh is just like music, it lingers in the heart,
And where its melody is heard, the ills of life depart;
And happy thoughts come crowding, its joyful notes to greet;
A laugh is just like music, for making living sweet.'

"WCOY now signs off. We're saying 'God night' with a smile."

TAUNTON ASSOCIATION, MASSACHUSETTS, held its 91st annual meeting with First church, North Attleboro, Sept. 29. The pastor of the entertaining church, Rev. William H. Wakefield, Jr., was moderator, and J. Albert Vachon, clerk. The meetings were well attended and proved inspiring. Speakers included Dr. George A. Huntley of China, who spoke on "Educational Evangelism"; Miss Elizabeth M. Allport of Cuba, who spoke on "Christianity at Work in Cuba"; and Rev. James T. Rider, Jr., of Tremont Temple, Boston, who spoke on evangelism. Rev. Isaac Higginbotham, field secretary of the Massachusetts convention, and Rev. Willard L. Pratt, state councillor for the Royal Ambassadors, gave the proper missionary urge. A splendid program was put on at the supper table by the young people, six in number, followed by a fine address on "Youth's Contribution to the Church" by Rev. W. Douglas Swaffield of the Taunton church. During the noon hour the woman's missionary union of the association held an important meeting. The resolutions passed included one asking the people to uphold the national prohibition laws and all officials to strictly enforce these laws. Reference was made to the retirement of Rev. Nathan Bailey of New Bedford from a fourteen years' pastorate in North church there. A resolution was adopted concerning the leaving of Rev. E. C. Herrick of Fall River, congratulating him on having been elected to the presidency of Newton Theological institution.

THE BARNSTABLE ASSOCIATION, Massachusetts, held its ninety-fifth anniversary,
Sept. 30-Oct. 1, in Nantucket, island, county and town all in one, quaint and intensely interesting. Association meetings were so full of interest and enthusiasm that all the delegates seemed to attend all the sessions. In some respects the reports were better than in previous years. Special evangelistic services had been held in nine of the fourteen churches and good results were evident. The number of baptisms was more than that of any other year since 1917. The total local expenses of the churches were larger than for many years. The annual sermon by Rev. F. M. Holt and all the addresses were of a high order; special emphasis was given to evangelism. Impressive talks on Sunday-school work were given by Mrs. A. T. Ringold on "Supplemental Work with the Classes", and Mrs. F. M. Holt on "Pageantry". A sacred drama, "The Challenge of the Cross", was presented by ladies of the entertaining church. Speakers from outside the association were Rev. B. T.
Livingston, general secretary of the evangelistic association of New England, who conducted the devotional services of all the sessions, and gave an address on evangelism; Rev. Isaac Higginbotham, field secretary of the Massachusetts convention, who gave an address on "The Determining Factor," and spoke on religious education in the churches; Sunday schools and the association; Elizabeth Allport, from Cuba, who gave an address on "Pearls from the Pearl of the Antilles";
Rev. W. L. Pratt of Dorchester who spoke on the work of the Royal Ambassadors; and George Huntly, M. D., from China, who spoke on the work of a physician and surgeon in the foreign field, a noble message, closing one of the most satisfying associational meetings for many years.

The Psychology of Middle Adolescence, by Mary E. Moxcey. New York: Methodist Book Concern. 60 cents.

A booklet helpful to all who have to do with the nurture and training of boys and girls. Confessedly it is an age that perplexes home and church with respect to what is best to do for adolescents and how it can be done. This volume by an "expert" will prove helpful.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

Religious Dramas, Vol. 2, selected by the committee on drama of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. New York: Century. $3.

This book comes forth because of the special interest that was shown in the first volume prepared by the federal council in 1924. It contains the ten best plays that have appeared during the past year. They have been chosen with a view to the needs of the average group of players and can be produced under a variety of conditions. The authors have caught the deep spiritual significance of the truths they wish to depict and at the same time have made the characters interesting and the situations tense. The plays given in this volume are: "The Quest Divine", M. N. Gould; "The Two Thieves", Esther W. Bates; "The Sword of the Samurai", T. D. Mygatt; "Two Sides of the Door", Margaret Cooper; "St. Claudia", M. N. Gould; "The Alabaster Box", A. J. Harnell; "Whither Goest Thou?", C. H. Currie; "At the Gate Beautiful", H. S. Mason; "Barabbas", Dorothy Leamon; "The Shepherd", by Marshall N. Gould.

Baptist City Planning, by Charles Hatch Sears. Philadelphia: the Judson Press. $1.

Here is the latest, the most necessary, the most complete and the most authoritative word on a subject which Baptists must consider or else they will sidetrack and atrophy the Baptist movement. What gives it such a high degree of sufficiency is the fact that it is a product of expert knowledge combined with a broad view. Dr. Charles H. Sears is preeminently the Baptist expert on the subject of evangelizing, moralizing and socializing the city. In addition, he had the assistance of nearly 150 people who have actual experience in Christian work in the city in many lines and under a great variety of conditions. Each chapter is a special study by a committee selected for that phase of the subject and it is signed by the committee. The whole is set forth as the authoritative finding of the city missions committee of the Northern Baptist Convention. A mere enumeration of the problems treated would be impossible in the space available for this review. But it is difficult to think of a problem that arises in all of the manifold and complex concerns of a city church or of a city neighborhood that needs a church, which is not here intelligently, comprehensively and concisely presented. A brief but admirably selected index adds to the value of the book, which is likely to become a denominational classic and may mark a definite expansion in the program of the Baptist denomination.

The Repression of Crime, by Harry Elmer Barnes. New York: Doran. $2.50.

How is the crime wave to be reduced? How are the criminals to be treated? How is crime to be prevented? What should be done to revise our methods of criminal jurisprudence? What have we learned from our experience in dealing with criminals during the past century? These and many more questions are discussed by Prof. Harry Elmer Barnes in his recent book. After he has made a careful survey of the history of criminal jurisprudence and of the influence of our criminal institutions, the development of penal industry and modern theories of penology, he offers his own remedies. The historical portion of his book is splendid. The portion that sets forth the plan of behavioristic philosophy as the solution is inadequate, not because he has not presented it with vigor, for he has, but because behaviorism is incapable of offering an adequate solution. His statement that "Leopold was suffering from a compulsion neurosis on a homosexual basis which seemed headed toward a paranoid psychosis, while Loeb was in the initial stages of a dementia-praecox psychosis" does not, it seems, take into consideration all of the data, and his denial of freedom of choice allowed to the normal citizen and the criminal alike do not make for a solution of crime.

Teaching Truth by Object Lessons

Bible Object Book

By Clarence H. Woolston, D. D.

Approach to mind and heart through eye-gate is the idea Doctor Woolston emphasizes in these pages. Some well-known principles of magic and mechanics have been made preachers of morals and religion.

By temperament and abilities that have been developed in long experience, in the church of which he has been pastor, on the lecture platform, and in conferences, the author is eminently fitted to write a book for preachers and teachers who would win children to Christ. The more than half a hundred object lessons described, simple and inexpensive, are such as are at the command of any teacher. Illustrated.

itive style, and peppered with caustic criticisms sometimes amounting to cynicism. These do not detract from its tableness or add to its value as an apologetic. We demur to its title for "Christianity" it presents has throughout the whole history of Christianity been held as "another gospel" unknown to the inspired text-book of Christianity, the New Testament; it is "progressive," if by that term the word implies that it is a new development in the history of the divine religion. Instead of being that type of progressivism it is as old as Porphyry and was only dressed in a differentiating garb. Occasionally the author comes into conflict, like a famous character in fiction, with a windmill and fights it only to a brilliant triumph. This type of fighting is seen when he selects the discarded and ancient interpretation of scriptures or literal exegesis of the passages long relegated to the pile of the extravagances of bygone ages, but this brilliant writer exerts their scalps as those of "fresh men" reduced to that condition by his attacks.

—H. O. ROWLANDS.

Briggs, by Rollo Walter Brown. New York: Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

One of the finest biographies ever written, that might well serve as a model of biographical writing. While the literary excellence is great, its chief virtue is clearness with which the reader knows the man, Dean Briggs. He dominates every page.

In Le Baron Briggs, of Harvard, we have called "the best-beloved college professor in America", "the most heroic figure in higher education", "the ham Lincoln of the university", "the living patron saint of American college men", "the finest example of American civilization". The justification for these extraordinary judgments is found in the careers of the men who were members of his English classes came under the stimulating influence of his strong and unique personality. The lives of his students who have won literary distinction and had a healthful influence is long and includes many of the best writers of our day. What did Dean Briggs do for these men? "He set them free", says Mr. Brown. To Dean Briggs education consisted not in learning what others have thought, not in reflective thinking, but in arousing to great activity the student's powers, opening his eyes to his own possibilities. To the last Dean Briggs kept stimulating hold on his students, because as Mr. Brown says, "He had not fallen into either a cynic or a pedagogue. He had kept himself in a constant state of renaissance."

After Death, What Then? by William Evans. New York: Revell. $1.50.

A purely traditional work, with no attempt made to evaluate sources of information. Job, as an historical person, is quoted as authority. For method, you learn what the ideas on the subject have been in past ages, you assemble the sayings in which those ideas were expressed, you take the total impression thus gained to be true doctrine of the future existence, then you proceed to exhort people to prepare for eternity. There is nothing newer or truer. The whole argument from modern psychology seems not to have entered the field of the author's observation. The book will help those who find its method congenial to their mental habits.

Service Hymnal, by Samuel W. Beazley. Chicago: Samuel W. Beazley and Son. $1.

We like the foreword in the "Service Hymnal", by Samuel Beazley, which closes with: "It is our prayer that 'Service Hymnal' may advance spiritual growth in our churches. 'Let all the people praise Him.'" There is an assurance that a book prepared in such a spirit must go to the very heart of spiritual life. The "Service Hymnal" is a "storehouse of great treasures" containing 745 numbers with additional pages of responsive readings and other helps. By much research the editor has brought forward many very old and useful hymns. About one hundred of the hymns are new. In the "Service Hymnal" is embodied in great variety the best in hymnody. No department of church work has been overlooked. Five tables of indices, covering twenty-five pages and printed in large, clear type, make it easy to find any desired selection. There is also a helpful summary of subject matter. "Service Hymnal" is printed on the best grade of opacity English finish paper, strongly sewed and well bound. By using thin opaque paper the thickness of the book of 672 pages is reduced to a convenient size.

Church Administration, by William H. Leach. New York: Doran. $2.

A practical discussion of the philosophy and technique of church administration containing an abundance of illustrative material and up-to-date information on almost every phase of the church activity. Mr. Leach is a Presbyterian minister who for some years has given particular attention to the problems of church administration. He founded and edits Church Management, the minister's trade journal.

Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament (Greek), by A. T. Robertson. New York: Doran. $2.50.

This is the twenty-eighth book to the credit of this Greek scholar of international fame, almost all of them on New Testament characters and literature. The author's name is the best introduction to anything he writes. He gives a résumé of the story of New Testament translations and resultant versions which is as instructive as it is interesting even to a lay reader. This occupies a third of the book. The remainder discusses the early manuscripts of the New Testament discovered among different nations and in different countries. It is a book for the classroom and for students of the Greek New Testament, but the lay reader and the studious pastor can glean a wealth of golden grain and the scholar will find it full of rich sheaves.

his pastorate the use of the English language was introduced, the Sunday school graded, a new church built, a parsonage purchased, and funds amounting to $140,000 raised.

IN ORDER TO MAKE the Sunday evening services both popular and evangelistic, Pastor Ray Starr, at Toulon, Ill., makes large use of special nights and special services representing various specific interests in the community. Services are largely attended and there are frequent conversions.

TEMPLE CHURCH, Charleston, W. Va., welcomed ten additions in September. One evening of the program of the state convention was given to memorializing great Baptist leaders of the state by dedicating the new organ to their memory and placing over it a memorial tablet bearing their names.

"WHAT HAS HAPPENED to the man who no longer counts?" is a question which Pastor G. Pitt Beers, of Park Memorial church, Springfield, Mass., asks in his church bulletin.

ASHLAND AVENUE CHURCH, Toledo, Ohio, pays the registration fee for all of its Sunday-school workers who will attend the local training school of the city.

AT THE FIRST SERVICE in the pastorate of Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick at Park Avenue church, New York City, the crowd overflowed the auditorium long before the hour of beginning, and the overflow was provided for in the men's auditorium, where Doctor Woelfkin conducted the services. The order of services in both rooms was synchronized and a loud speaker carried Doctor Fosdick's sermon to both audiences. At the communion service in the afternoon two were baptized and thirty received the hand of fellowship.

CHURCH BULLETINS of many churches in all parts of the country are decorated with pictures of beautiful buildings. THE BAPTIST can use cuts accompanying news notes for these columns, providing such cuts are not more than four and one-half inches wide. Cuts will be returned as soon as possible after using.

PASTOR CHARLES F. HOLLER introduced variety at the Lord's Supper in Trinity church, Omaha, Neb. Careful preparation had been made for a covenant service. Deacons stood at the communion table holding the bread. While singing a hymn the people passed in procession receiving the bread. The same order was repeated for the cup. A third time the procession passed a chest provided for financial pledges, each dropping into it his pledge for the year. Results are said to have been highly gratifying.

Notes on the Lesson for October 31

THE EVILS OF STRONG DRINK

Lesson Text: Prov. 23:29-35. Golden Text: Prov. 23:32

Again we come to a World's Temperance Sunday. We leave for the day the sequence of lessons in the Old Testament and turn to a topic of perennial interest.

Admitted.

Probably nobody in his right senses anywhere in the world would deny the argument of the lesson. The picture drawn so colorfully by the writer of Proverbs is in reality an end of argument for intoxication by strong drink. All the things enumerated have been seen in every generation since men began to distill the grains for their alcohol content and to make intoxicants in every other way known to brewing and to wine manufacture. Woes, sorrows, contentions, wounds, red eyes and noses, loss of equilibrium, soddenness and brain storms have been the marks of drunkenness from the earliest day of human history to the latest "drunk" hauled in the patrol bus to the lockup. Everybody admits it. The vote on the question of what strong drink does to the man who uses it to excess is so unanimous that it lacks the interest of other questions which offer a chance for debate. The evils of strong drink are admitted by the drunkard himself, by the man who sells him the drink, by society as a whole. And the evils of strong drink are not confined to the drunkard, as the lesson seems to limit the evils, but modern society has tabulated the evils economically, politically, socially, industrially, and still everybody admits the evils of strong drink to be unsupportable.

Approved.

In spite of the fact that the evils of strong drink in society are generally admitted without any attempt to defend them, a large part of society seems to feel that they are necessary evils and must be fostered under some form of regulation. The idea of stamping out the evils by going back to the causes and removing them as we do with typhoid fever and other diseases does not seem to appeal to a minority of our citizens. On the contrary these citizens stand for the regulation of the evils by some form of license or state control. Prohibition such as we have incorporated into the constitutional law of the United States is obnoxious to them. So while voting unanimously on the evils of strong drink, society splits on the methods of dealing with the evils. That is the feverish situation in America today. Prohibition as a national method of dealing with the traffic in strong drink is assailed as a failure by men who in their personal habits are strictly teetotalers as well as by men who would profit financially or politically by a return to the open saloon. Nevertheless, America, according to all the evidences, is set for the defense of national prohibition to the last ditch.

The Saving Sense

"The pain seems to shoot from arm to my head."
"Naturally. It follows the line of least resistance."

Final Boss: "And what's on your mind, Tommy?"

Start Office Boy: "Nothin' but me sir."

At the end of the service tonight the will sing a special anthem composed by the organist, after which the church will be closed for a month for necessary repairs.—The Humorist.

The Christian Leader quotes this from a North Carolina paper: "Mr. C. B. Moody, a dairyman, announces that he is now in position to supply his patrons with the milk they want and that he can serve several more new customers since he has just installed city water, and that the milk is purer than when he had to use well water."

"Heels three and one-half inches long. What next?"
"Corn plasters!"

Baptist and Reflector gives the following epitaph as inscribed on a tombstone in the cemetery of an Alabama lies the body of Solomon Pease, the daisies and under the trees;

he is not here, only the pod—shelled out and went home to God."

a: "Too bad to keep you waiting long, Oscar, but I had to have my hat. It's the latest from Paris."

ar: "For the love of peaches!
Don't you have taken a hat that came from a tailor instead of keeping me here with the taxi meter climbing to the sky?"

YOUTH IN THE MINISTRY and THE BAPTIST

Some time ago The Baptist decided to find out what type of sermons were being preached by the young men in our pulpits. Therefore the presidents and deans of our colleges, seminaries and Bible institutes were requested to nominate men who had received their training in these schools and who had not been in the ministry more than ten years. Each of the nominees was asked to furnish a sermon for publication in THE BAPTIST.

YOUTH READILY RESPONDS

The response was prompt and gracious. More than two score of the young men in Baptist pulpits within the area of the Northern Convention have sent in sermon manuscripts or have promised to do so.

REPRESENTATIVE SERMONS

The sermons preached by these young men are samples of what the pews get every Sunday. No special sermon has been fixed up for publication in The Baptist. Each manuscript stands for a sermon preached recently. All types of schools are represented by the preachers and all kinds of ministers are among the nominees.

Now Is the Time to Subscribe

The publication of this special series of sermons by young Baptist preachers will begin in THE BAPTIST of December 4.

The sermons will run concurrently with

THE WORLD PULPIT

The high quality of THE BAPTIST will be maintained with feature articles by Bernard Clausen and H. BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION OF AMERICA

Folks, Facts and Opinion

From Shelby County Baptist Association, Kentucky, comes the report that "it was unanimously decided that no one but a Protestant or Baptist should be allowed to teach in any public school of the state or nation." Suppose that some Roman Catholic assembly had proposed to exclude all teachers from the public schools except Roman Catholics. What kind of a song would Shelby Association sing?

To the vast mixture of races in Hawaii is added an influx of laborers for work on the sugar plantations. Conditions aside from wages seem to be unusually humane. They include free transportation to and from Hawaii, free rent, water, fuel and medical attendance. There is a fixed scale of wages for men, women and children. Men receive $20 a month of twenty-six days, women $14 and children according to ability. But the hours per day are ten and twelve. This may be an improvement over labor conditions in the Philippines, but by all precedents there will be abuses, and the world may listen for a cry arising from the sugar plantations in Hawaii.

A negro bearing the eloquent Irish name of Charles O'Neil has a signed editorial in the Record-Searchlight in which he calls Attorney-General Sargent to account in the following fervid terms: "He can sit in Washington and look toward the South and see five million members of our race in bondage. He can see them burned at the stake, hanged to trees, cornered by mobs . . . and shot down like dogs. He sees inequality in the schools. He sees our farmers robbed of their products. He sees our women forced to live in concubinage . . . He sees us disfranchised . . . and abused on every hand—and by Americans." This is of course a cry rather than a philosophy, but when such lamentation is in the air the wise will listen.

Winnetka is an Illinois village. It has dedicated a town hall, as villages sometimes do. The building cost $250,000 and is paid for. Where did Winnetka get the money? The village owns an electric plant costing $435,000 that has paid for itself, and a water supply system worth nearly $600,000 that has paid for itself. The profits from these two properties paid for the town hall. It still has the water plant, the electric plant and the town hall, has no bonded debt except for school purposes, and is still making money. These backward Winnetka villagers do not seem to have heard of the economic heresies and dangers that are said to lurk in the ownership and management by the community of its own utilities. Or is their bliss due to their wisdom?

Divorces in which children are involved seem to be decreasing in number in the United States. This decrease may be due to several causes not yet investigated, and partly to incomplete statistics. It would be interesting to know how far the presence of children in the home operates as a deterrent to divorce.

One discovery after another reveals new sources of wealth in Alaska. It has been known that the Tongass national forest is unsurpassed in the United States in the abundance of timber for paper pulp. But recent aerial surveys have revealed that the water power resources of that region may be easily and cheaply developed to supply not less than 450,000 horse-power. The problem will be to prevent the wasting of those resources by private exploitation.

Australians have rejected by a considerable majority proposed amendments to the constitution of the commonwealth designed to give the government more complete authority to control industry and to provide for the essential economic needs of the people through such control. Both proposals were rejected by nearly the same majorities. But New South Wales and Queensland voted in favor of both. When it is remembered that Australia is comparatively a new country with a highly developed individualism in the spirit of the people, the strength of the vote in favor of the amendments is surprising.

Gypsy Smith is going on with his remarkable work as an evangelist and greater results attend his ministry than ever before in his long career. For some time he has been in Australia. Recently he closed a mission in Sydney covering sixteen days only and 80,000 decision cards were signed.

Methodists regard the granting of an honorary degree by Northwestern university to Rev. Arthur F. Winnington-Ingram, Lord Bishop of London, as a "significant" incident. And probably it is so. At any rate, the time was when John Wesley and his revival meetings were barred from the Episcopal church to which he belonged. Now the Lord Bishop accepts a "D. D." from a Wesleyan school, and perhaps not less significant is the "Bishops' Crusade," a revival movement now in progress among Episcopal churches essentially similar to that of the Wesleys.

Surprise is expressed in certain governmental quarters at the possibility of a practice of selling arms and munitions to China. High officials in the state department even say that in their opinion such a thing is being done. The business is so obvious and well-known as to be far removed from the field of opinion. Not only Russia but the rest of the nations have been rushing the manufacture and sale of war materials. It is ordinary business with local restrictions here and there. Several leading nations agreed among themselves not to supply arms to the Chinese. Russia was not admitted to the agreement. Who imagined that she would not supply them?

Lodz in Poland had before the war the largest membership of any Baptist church on the continent of Europe. Recently it was the scene of one of the regional conferences being held in connection with the tour of President Mullins and Doctor Rushbrooke. White Russians, Ukrainians, Poles, Czechs and Germans assembled to the number of 2,000. The service required the use of five languages. People stood for hours and many were unable to gain entrance to the building. For numbers and enthusiasm the conference was a surprise to its promoters. Special credit for its success is given to Miss Wenske, Mr. Gutsche, and Pastors Kupsch, Lenz, Drews and Micksa who served as organizers and interpreters. A conference had been called for Moscow, but it was canceled because the Mullins party was unable to secure visas for the trip. Doctor Rushbrooke thinks that the difficulty is due not to any strain between the Baptists and the U. S. S. R. but to the general political situation.

Dean Warren P. Behan of Ottawa university was also dean of the Kansas Baptist summer assembly. He resigned the latter position. THE BAPTIST erred by excess in reporting the matter. We stated that he has resigned the deanship of the university. We are happy to say that no such disaster has befallen the denomination. He is still the honored dean of Ottawa university.

The department of missionary education announces the appointment of Miss Mildred Davidson of Chicago, field secretary of the World Wide Guild and the Children's World Crusade. Miss Davidson has had several years of active work in her local guild chapter and for the past three years has been president of the Chicago guild union, including all children in Chicago and its suburbs. She has also been active in the B. Y. P. U. work in Chicago and is a member of its city executive committee. She is a graduate of the University of Chicago and of a business college and has had a few years of actual business experience as secretary in a law office. She has already visited the Holy Land and the Near East and she sails with her family early in January for five months to the Orient where she hopes to visit some of our mission stations. In fact Miss Davidson is our guild and crusade envoy plenipotentiary carrying greetings from the guilders and crusaders of America to the guilds and crusades in India, Burma, China, Japan and Philippine Islands. While her active service to the present has been mostly with the W. W. G. she is equally enthusiastic over the C. W. C. and realizes that for all the child is the answer to the future missionary program of the church and the denomination.

The Christian Advocate of New York has recently observed its centennial. Sept. 9 the centennial number of the paper was issued. It contains 168 pages with artistic covers. The history of this journal covering the period from September 1826 to September 1926, is digested and illustrated in the centennial number. James R. Joy, the editor, and his associates have reason to be proud of this achievement. American Methodism has no greater asset in its denominational literature than the Christian Advocate. Among all the able editors who have sustained the high standards of the papers none was greater than James M. Buckley. It is cheering to learn that the circulation of this centenary journal is in excess of any other denominational weekly newspaper published in the United States.

Covers Were Laid for Twelve

A GROUP of Christian women were discussing the eighteenth amendment. They had come together from many different sections of the United States. They talked of the effects of the amendment, the charges often brought against it, and the difficulties placed in the way of its enforcement. The discussion brought to light many things. Since then other things have been brought to light. The covers have been lifted from some truths.

First cover: It is often stated that the eighteenth amendment was "put over" or "slipped through," presumably when those who would have seen its "peril" were engaged in patriotic business elsewhere. As a matter of fact, forty-six of the forty-eight states in the union ratified the eighteenth amendment, a record absolutely unapproached by any other amendment to our constitution.

Second cover: We are told that many congressmen who at first favored prohibition are now determined to secure repeal or modification. The results of the recent primaries held in various states show that "more than 75 per cent of the congressmen and 80 per cent of the senators nominated in those districts where the nomination ordinarily means an election are candidates who stand for the maintenance and enforcement of prohibition," according to Wayne B. Wheeler, attorney for Anti-Saloon League.

The following admission of conditions appeared in the columns of one of the "wettest" newspapers in the United States:

"The modificationists do not by any means expect that the next congress will be wet. They hope to make some gains in November in both the house and the senate. They realize that the dry majorities in both houses are at present so overwhelming as to make it impossible to overturn them in a single election."

That they are not relaxing efforts to "overturn them" eventually is evidenced by these extracts, said to be from a letter sent from the national headquarters of the association opposed to prohibition:

"It costs us, on an average, $1500 to organize in a congressional district effectively enough to win a congressman there."

"Will you be one of three $500 contributors to take care of one district, or will you be one of the fifteen $100 contributors?"

While they are waiting for contributors to respond, some are proclaiming as already accomplished those results which the money is designed to help accomplish.

Third cover: We are constantly hearing and reading that there is more drinking now than in pre-prohibition days. Yet no less an authority than Irving Fisher, professor of economics at Yale university, in a book just off the press, declares that present beverage consumption of alcohol is "certainly less than 16 per cent, probably less than 10 per cent of pre-prohibition consumption." This conclusion is based upon a careful study of United States treasury and other statistics.

The records of the secretary of state for New York are said to show that in that "state of great cities" last year arrests for intoxication fell off almost 10 per cent from the preceding year although the population had increased by at least 100,000.

"Every test shows that prohibition has enormously reduced the consumption of liquor in America. I should regard it as a terrible disaster to lose the great step that we have made," declared S. S. McClure, editor of McClure's Magazine.

Fourth cover: One says, "The newspapers contain so many more reports of drinking and drunkenness than they did before prohibition." Yes, the press takes care to give full publicity to the drinking there is now, for the violation of a law has news value. When no law was violated by the manufacture or sale of liquor no newspaper notice was taken of it. Although the amount of drinking was so much greater then, we read less about it.

Fifth cover: It is claimed that the eighteenth amendment is a curtailment of "personal liberty." In that same sense all law is a curtailment of personal liberty, for it places upon individual liberty of action those restraints which are necessary to the well being of society and of the state. Shall we then repeal all laws directed toward the control of individual conduct in order that there shall be no infringement of personal liberty? Who would be content to live in a state where this was tried? No foreign foe, however powerful, could present to us a menace comparable to this menace of anarchy.

"Our constitution was not adopted to secure absolute liberty. With the felicity of diction which marks this wonderful document, its aim is to secure 'the blessings of liberty.' If liberty is to be a blessing and not a curse it must be a liberty which subserves not the crude egotism of the individual but the general welfare," Prof. Henry W. Farnum declares in "Law, Liberty and Progress," in the Yale Review.

William Howard Taft, chief justice of the United States supreme court, says: "If a man thinks a law must suit him before he obeys it he is not a democrat but an anarchist. The basis of good government is obedience to law as the people have determined it to be."

When we are ready to grant full "personal liberty" to the druggist who fills our prescriptions, to the engineer who guides the train on which we ride, and to the driver of the automobile on the streets which our children must cross, then we are ready to talk of "personal liberty" for the liquor interests.

Sixth cover: It is repeatedly urged that the law cannot be a wise and just one because there are so many violations of it. However, the blame for law violation rests not upon the law but upon the law breaker. It would be quite as reasonable to denounce those laws which make murder a crime, for in spite of the law murders are still committed. Or to condemn all traffic laws because there are drivers who continually disregard them. The remedy for law violation lies in law enforcement and in prompt punishment of violators.

Seventh cover: We are assured that it is impossible to enforce the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead act, therefore it would be better to repeal them rather than to face the inevitable failure. To believe that it is impossible to enforce laws which by a large majority vote have been enacted and placed upon the statute books would be to strike a blow at the heart of the government under which we have been living for nearly 150 years. It would be to declare that our constitution is a worthless thing. It would be to admit that government "of the people, by the people and for the people" has been a failure. It would be to acknowledge that privately owned business can and does successfully defy the sovereignty of the citizens of the United States.

"Enforcement of law and obedience to law, by the very nature of our institutions, are not matters of choice in this republic," states President Coolidge, "but the expression of a moral requirement of living in accordance with the truth. They are clothed with a spiritual significance in which is revealed the life or the death of the American ideal of self government."

Eighth cover: The complaint is made that enforcement of the eighteenth amendment is costing the taxpayers of the country too much. This, in the face of official reports of taxes many times reduced! Hon. John Q. Tilson of Connecticut, speaking in the house of representatives July 3, stated that from 1921 to 1926 "taxes have been reduced from $5,700,000,000 annually to approximately $3,200,000,000 annually. The national debt has been reduced by nearly five billion dollars and the interest on the national obligation by more than two hundred million dollars a year."

Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, prohibition enforcement chief, has informed the house appropriations committee that the cost of prohibition enforcement for the fiscal year 1927 will be $29,120,122. The biggest item is $15,553,427 for coast guard expansion, including the purchase of additional patrol ships and the cost of operating them in the campaign against rum runners. A deficiency appropriation of $2,931,010 also is necessary, so that the cost of the prohibition force by itself is put at $10,635,685.

Herbert M. Lord, director of the budget, has tentatively fixed the prohibition

Coming to Grips with Atheism

“SCIENCE is routing the gods.” Such is the recent triumphant shout of an adherent of the movement to revive atheism. And in the persuasion that the statement is true and ought to be true, atheists are organizing an effective propaganda. They have formed and incorporated the American Association for the Advancement of Atheism described by its followers as “a militant foe of the churches and the clergy”. They are organizing the Junior Atheist League for the purpose of enlisting school children. They propose to organize “Damned Souls Societies” (and to call them by that name) in the colleges and universities. They intend to supplant Sunday-school instruction with courses of study and inspiration built up from the atheistic point of view. Such courses are in preparation. They define atheism as doubt of, disbelief in, denial of, the existence of God, or supreme intelligent being. They stand for and will promote “morality based on the findings of modern science”, which “will supersede belief based on the speculations of ancient, Asiatic theology”.

How far they will be able to carry forward their ambitious program is yet to appear, but the practical question for believers in God is that of the right way to meet their program. It is, of course, obvious that the general Christian enterprise of giving the gospel to all mankind who will receive it must go right on. There ought to be no intolerance, no attempt to bar the atheist from the enjoyment of any civil right that Christians ask for themselves, no invoking of the social stigma, no misrepresenting the atheist as a bolshevist, an anarchist or some other hateful thing, no common social prejudice, no effort to awaken against him a suspicion of bad moral character, no distorting the meaning of what he says for the purpose of setting him in an unfavorable light. He is entitled to the same courtesy that the real Christian extends to any earnest seeker for light. Or if he should not be a sincere seeker for light, let him demonstrate his own character, which sooner or later he will do.

Meanwhile let nobody cry, “Fire”, and try to start alarm and panic among believers. Let everybody keep his head, his feet and his temper. There have always been atheists. The wonder is that they have not long ago undertaken an organized propaganda. That such a propaganda will endanger the faith of an indefinite number of half-believers in Christianity may be taken as a matter of course. But all discussion of vital religious problems carries that danger. It is inevitable wherever people think earnestly and differently on religion. But there are compensations. Such a controversy will shake a lot of half Christians out of their slumber. It will clarify a mass of foggy religious thinking. It will give to a multitude of people a more definite and true idea of what religion really means. It will force religious liberalism to more careful self-definition. It will correct a great deal of shallowness in religious teaching and preaching and compel a radical restudy of the grounds of religious faith. It will make common Christianity a more vital force in human life. Therefore the Christian can afford to meet this assault calmly, quietly, thoughtfully, confidently.

Moreover, science may be routing the gods, but it is far from abolishing God. We welcome the appeal to science. In choosing that field the atheist has chosen the field most favorable to faith and most fatal to his own cause. But since he invokes the name of science and renounces speculative theology, his cause must stand or fall by the testimony of science, of modern science, of critical science, of exact science. Never since religion began has faith found such an invincible reinforcement as it receives from modern science. And this statement is true, not merely because the facts of modern science supply some parables for religious teaching, but for a far more fundamental reason. The scientific hypothesis of a Spirit of the Universe, competent to think, will, effect and direct the universe in all-embracing, soul-awakening, socializing truth, rightness and good-will is also Jesus’ hypothesis of a personal heavenly Father who, most perfectly identified in the passion of unselfish love, is the only hypothesis by which human reason can work its way through the labyrinth of the universe as discovered by modern science. Here, above all, is the very field in which Christian faith, rightly conceived, invites the most scrutinizing inquiry.

If the atheist can discover any beliefs among Christians which are falsely "based on the speculations of ancient Asiatic theology", whatever that phrase may mean, let him point them out. True religion seeks a foundation of universal truth. It is always trying to free itself from the speculations of anybody's theology and to find its interpretation in scientifically grounded right living. It knows by experience that as yet "we know in part" and can only approximate finalities in thinking. It knows that all of our churches and clergy are open to criticism, and that in their sincere moods they are keenly self-critical. Therefore he who in whatever temper points out remediable faults in theology, in church, or in clergy, renders to them and to humanity at large a real service. When, however, he frankly declares himself a "militant foe" of everything religious, the world is plainly advised as to the scientific value of his opposition.

For a final word, the most vulnerable point of atheism is its lack of scientific spirit and method. In almost every utterance of its spokesmen they reveal more of a sentimental animosity than of a regard for facts. There is a whole vast field of personal and social experience, rich in those special phenomena relevant to the subject of religion, which is as truly a legitimate field for scientific inquiry as any within the range of human knowledge. Generation after generation many of the most capable thinkers specialize in the study of this field and increasingly contribute to our rational knowledge of religious truth. But the atheist prefers to dismiss, disparage, avoid and ignore this field of investigation altogether, or if he enters it at all he enters it speculatively and refuses to make experimental test of the nature of its facts. One might as well deny electrical science because he neither knows nor cares enough about it to switch on the lights.

A Century of Theological Education

UNDER the heading, "A Century of Theological Education", an article appears in the July number of the Journal of Religion. The author is William Adams Brown of Union Theological seminary. The article was originally given as an address at the 100th anniversary of the theological seminary of the Reformed church, Lancaster, Pa. Beginning with a reference to the fact that all the theological schools of long standing in America are either just over or under one hundred years old, Doctor Brown proceeds to set forth the profound changes that have come upon theological education during the century and especially in the last twenty-five years. "The simple trust of our fathers" has been changed into "an attitude of questioning which reaches down to the very foundations of the Christian faith."

"Four great waves have swept the intellectual life of America" in much less than a hundred years. Physical science, historical criticism, modern sociology and the new psychology have washed in upon theological education with a serious inundation. And what have the seminaries done under these conditions? Some of them have built sea walls against the flood; others have made a tardy and inadequate attempt to ride the waves. In the colleges, physics and chemistry have driven out Greek and Latin, consequently the student for the ministry who goes from college to the divinity school for his theological training is not prepared for the required classical lore that still exists in the curriculum of many seminaries. And when it comes to the wave of historical criticism it is still a moot question whether the student for the ministry should be subjected to the dangers of that wave and taught to harness it as an ally of his ministry, or should be protected from it behind the strong wall of traditional dogmatic. Modern sociology having lifted society out of its individualistic smugness and given it a consciousness of solidarity, the problem of the social gospel is thereby pushed to the front, but difficulty is experienced in getting students for the ministry to interpret human life in terms of Pittsburgh or Chicago. And while the new psychology is welcomed into the field of general knowledge, the cold shoulder is much in evidence when the psychological scientist enters "the citadel of religion, where the soul stands face to face with God," and attempts "with his dissecting knife to explain not only the beliefs of religion but its emotions and aspirations."

In discussing the resources available to the theological seminaries to meet the situation, Professor Brown mentions the social gospel, the movement for Christian unity, religious education and fundamentalism. "The social gospel is the attempt to draw the consequences for Christianity of the new conception of personality which is the result of the social studies of the last two generations."

For instance, "It is the attempt to restate the ideal of Christian missions in terms large enough to include all the relations of the Christian life." And with regard to Christian unity there is no longer any need for "the alternative of submission or revolt" because federation provides the necessary unity in variety. Religious education is still in its infancy. But it is an aggressive baby. It is an organized attempt to redeem the failure of American Protestantism in the education of the children of the church.

As to the fundamentalist movement as a resource of theological education we shall let Doctor Brown put it in his own significant words: "I realize keenly the limitations of this movement and the serious criticism to which it is open both from the point of view of intelligence and of spirit. Nevertheless, I believe that taken in the large it sounds a needed note of warning and recalls to our attention a phase of the religious experience that we have been tempted too often to neglect. I refer to the element of mystery in religion—the consciousness of standing in an august presence, where criticism is an impertinence and adoration alone in place. We miss this note in much of the newer theology. Christianity is reduced to a form of social ethics in which the service of man has pushed into the background the worship of God. We need to recover again the note of authority in the older religion—the sense of a 'needs must' that dominated the entire personality and made of the preaching of the gospel an inward necessity that could brook no denial. In reminding us of this neglected phase of our religion, the fundamentalists are rendering a needed service. They are summoning the church to reexamine its gospel to see whether it be indeed adequate to meet the need of a world in sin."

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

The Peace Movement Is Beginning to Move

Armistice day this year will become the center of great peace campaigns in many places. Pittsburgh will "devote armistice week to a discussion of disarmament"—Pittsburgh, note, the gunmaker's paradise. A program of public agitation is announced with a strong corps of really great Americans as speakers. Chicago is preparing a similar observance. In fact, the Pittsburgh conference will be transferred almost bodily to Chicago. It is expected that the churches in those cities where conferences are held will throw open their doors and pulpits in welcome to the occasion and to special speakers. In all parts of the country the "war against war" will be carried to the people. The most encouraging feature of the movement in its present stage is that all over Europe and in Japan the peace propaganda is probably more extensive and earnest than even in the United States.

How Many Christian Graces Are Able to Cross the Color Line?

The race problem is no longer, if it ever was, a problem of the South. The color line is visible wherever the colors meet. Among pagans (the word is used in its respectful and best sense) this line may be expected to interpose obstacles to the adjustment of human relationships. But the problem is a more serious one. It affects Christianity. It invades the field in which neither race nor color count, in which love is the social bond and character the test of fellowship. How far is Christianity able to cross the color line? One group of pagans can consistently tell the members of another to keep their place. It may prescribe their place for them. It may even cultivate good-will toward those who meekly accept its dictum. But can Christianity go no farther in the direction of brotherhood? Christ clearly intends a true community life among his people. What benefits of such a life may any group claim in the name of Christ as its exclusive privilege? From what benefits of such association may it bar people who are not of its racial group?

Laying Hide and Seek Between Two Different Things

It is the Christian Century. THE BAPTIST said that Baptist conventions are not separated from one another into different denominations but are cooperating organizations within the denomination for convenience and efficiency. Our neighbor cannot clearly see the difference and submits this test question: "If the Baptist body, north and south, were today one organic body, and division were threatened, one wonders if our good neighbor, THE BAPTIST, would look complacently on the imminent rupture." Of course, if the case were one which calls for such terminology as "threatened" and "rupture", both implying contention and a sundering of cooperative fellowship, we should not look upon it complacently. But if some other grouping than that which now exists were proposed in the interest of general denominational effectiveness, THE BAPTIST would decline to become excited and would consider the proposal on its merits. The fallacy of reasoning in the Christian Century on the subject is betrayed in another test question which it propounds namely: "Has the time come for an eastern Baptist and a western Baptist denomination, as well as a northern and a southern?" Get this: There is no northern or southern Baptist denomination, or eastern or western one, or Canadian, British,

Swedish, Australian, Chinese, black or white. All of these are groupings voluntarily formed with full common consent on the principle of the right of every group to follow its own judgment as to method, all bound together by spiritual bonds in one denominational fellowship, and all cooperating in such ways as seem good to them in common. Once more, a Baptist convention is not a Baptist denomination.

"Clerical Trespassers in The Field of Economics"

A commercial journal has discovered them and would shoo them out. The canon in brief is that a preacher has no right to tell a banker how to run his business. Why? Of course it is possible for a preacher to be ignorant of both the methods and morals of business, and to express himself on the subject like a ninny. But suppose he happens to know, as most sensible preachers do. Must he keep silent about righteousness as soon as he arrives at the "Loop" or Fifth Avenue? One of the surest ways to start an avalanche would be to give the impression abroad that the ethics of Christianity are barred from the banks, factories and offices of the business district. No man who has an intelligent message of justice, humanity, goodwill, fraternity, equality, cooperation, and the general welfare is a trespasser anywhere. He goes by divine right wherever men are. Any circle which bars him brands itself as a den of thieves.

Would End War by Stopping Conscription

An anti-conscription manifesto, signed by seventy of the most widely known men and women in fifteen nations of Europe and Asia which adhere to the League of Nations, urges the abolition of conscription in time of war. The signers believe that the universal abolition of conscription would be "a decisive step toward peace and liberty". It would. But it is a step which nations will not take until they have taken certain preceding ones. No nation will submit to conscription except under a compelling sense of danger. The problem is to create conditions that produce a sense of security. For this purpose there are two possible arrangements, either effective national armament or effective international government. Under modern conditions the nation that depends for its security upon war must conscript. Under an effective international government none will conscript. But let the anti-conscription agitation go on; it will help to keep the subject alive.

A Negro State of The United States

An organization calling itself the American Negro Protective Association announces an ambitious project. The idea is to buy all the land and property in some particular state of the United States, settle it with negroes exclusively so that they may organize their own government, build up their own institutions, and thereby obtain their civic and economic rights. The proposal is at least interesting. There are two questions involved in it. The first is whether the negroes themselves will be willing to trust themselves under the leadership of their own race to undertake such an enterprise. The second is whether the whites would consent to it. Conceivably there would be great obstacles interposed and it is possible that the enterprise would be prevented by a decree of the United States court. In such an enterprise there is also, of course, the hazard of exploitation by unscrupulous leaders.

The Greater Miracle of Faith

Have faith in God and again miracles will be wrought.

BY FREDERIC C. SPURR

ALL the mighty works of Christ were wrought on behalf of human welfare: to relieve distress, to assuage sorrow, to satisfy legitimate hunger, to beget hope, to give fuller meaning to life. They were "signs", on the material plane, of the rich love of God for our race, and of his deeper redemptive purpose for us. There is, however, one apparent exception. It is what we know as the cursing of the fig tree and it seems to be, at first sight, a miracle of destruction.

It was Monday in Holy Week (an important thing to remember) when this happened. The date has a great deal to do with the meaning of the incident. The story, upon the face of it, presents serious difficulties for faith. An action of this kind was so unusual with Jesus, so utterly foreign to what we generally associate with him. It was a destructive act for which a reason is not immediately apparent. And the exhortation to have faith in God and to believe in the omnipotence of prayer seems to be irrelevant and puzzling, as if the Lord had said, "If you only have faith enough you can do as I have done and wither what offends you"—a thing he could not possibly have meant. The story has been to many a stumbling-block, a puzzle, or a weapon against the immaculate character of our Lord. What, then, happened? What does the story mean?

A Hasty Conclusion

We cannot and will not believe that under the very shadow of the cross, when he was going forward to offer himself for the salvation of mankind, our Lord, in ill humor, blasted a tree that had disappointed him, and then declared that faith in God could do things like that—that is, use spiritual forces to curse natural defects. It is not thus that God acts. Our Lord did not curse the tree at all. The disciples, in their hasty judgment, thought he had done so. But they were mistaken and the word which has been taken to mean that faith can also curse, means in reality something very different.

Roots of trees are of two main kinds. Some, like the oak, go deep into the soil. The deeper they go, the more firmly established they become and, all things being normal, the less likelihood is there of sudden removal by storm, or withering for want of nourishment. The deep-rooted trees generally have big seeds, they are often selfsown, but, as it has been pointed out by a keen observer, they are rarely carried by birds. The roots of some trees lie upon the surface of the soil and often wind themselves around rocks, flinging out their fibers which creep along until they find a suitable soil in which they start real upward growth. The seeds of such trees, being small, are frequently carried by birds and dropped upon the scanty, rocky soil where their career as trees begins. Sometimes it happens that a layer of rock juts out and upon this is spread a thin layer of soil, in which the seed, dropped by a passing bird, is deposited. In a hot country like Palestine that deceptive soil, so shallow and easily exhausted, becomes a veritable "forcing bed" and results in an extraordinarily rapid growth of the sapling which is rooted in it. But the forcing bed is also a death bed. The rapidity of the growth announces the doom of the young tree.

That fig tree on the roadside to which the eyes of Jesus were drawn was a tree of this kind. Matthew (21:19) writes that it was a solitary tree. Its very singularity drew the attention of Christ to it. It was growing in shallow soil which hid from view the hot slab of rock beneath. The month was April. Already the days were hot (although, as the evangelist says, the nights were cold, necessitating the use of a brazier of fire). The growing heat of the sun, cooperating with the rock beneath, had forced the life of the fig tree until its leaves were all out, a sign in normal trees that the fruit was ready. In other words, this fig tree was falsely advertising itself as a fruitful tree at a time when no other fig tree was bearing. The life of the tree had gone to leaf and there was not enough nourishment left for the fruit. It said to the world, "I am exceptional, I am in advance of other fig trees. They are bare; I am clothed." And the onlooker—even as Christ—expected the fact to answer to the advertisement. But when he went up to it, the lie was apparent, there was no fruit. Its life was forced and unreal; the tree had reached its zenith; the soil was exhausted; the tree was dying. "None will ever eat fruit of you again," said Christ. And on the morning following when the disciples saw the tree with its drooping leaves and its general withered look, they knew he was right. I myself have seen in tropical countries these sudden witherings of trees which are startling enough to those who behold them for the first time. There is something uncanny about the process. Little wonder then that Peter thought Christ had cursed it. He had done nothing of the kind. His word was not the sentence of doom but an announcement of bare fact. The tree died a natural death for want of a generous soil.

The Penalty of Fruitlessness

Jesus immediately turned the incident to account. Remember, it was Monday before Good Friday. The most critical event in the history of mankind was rapidly approaching. The most favored people in the world had at length to decide whether they would fulfil their destiny by receiving their Messiah, or commit spiritual suicide by renouncing him. A few weeks earlier he had uttered in the ears of the rulers a solemn, parabolic warning: "A certain man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard and he came seeking fruit thereon and found none. And he said unto the vinedresser, 'Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree and find none. Cut it down. Why doth it also cumber the ground?' And he answering saith unto him, 'Lord, let it alone this year also till I shall dig about it and dung it. If it bear fruit thenceforth, well; but if not, thou shalt cut it down'" (Luke 13:6-9). The warning was pointed and unmistakable. The rulers knew what he meant. He meant them and their nation. Sheltered, privileged, tended by God, Israel was a fig tree planted in a vineyard. For three years they had with them to teach them and bless and love them, the Messiah himself. And they remained fruitless. Given to political intrigue, to graft, to mere forms of religion, their very soul was dying. And our Lord warned them in the parable, that unless they repented speedily the sands would run out and inevitable destruction overtake them. The tree would be cut down to make room for something worthier.

Now on this Monday in Holy Week when the dread tragedy is hastening to its climax, our Lord sees this fig tree dying by the roadside. His mind at once reverts to the parable he had spoken and in this physical tragedy of the roadside, he perceives the dramatization of the parable. The two things fuse in his mind. Here, in the natural world, is happening a like thing to that he predicted should happen in the nation. And he addresses the tree, personalizing it, as it were, and making it stand for the nation. In reality, it is the nation he addresses, almost in soliloquy. 'Jerusalem, forward, pretentious, showy, putting yourself forward before the rest of the world as in advance of all others, boasting of your temple, your law, your privileges; you are dying as you are boasting. The sap has dried up within you. Your life is shallow and hollow. Your roots do not go deep down into the eternal soil. They touch rock a little below the surface. You have thrust from you the final opportunity God has given you for repentance. I came to save you, but you are planning to crucify me. No fruit shall ever grow on you henceforth. Your day is over. As this fig tree is curling up and withering, so are you and for the same cause, you are without the root and without sap.'

The principle at the heart of that dramatic parable is true everywhere. There are churches like that tree. They make a big profession and offer a striking advertisement. They have ceremonial and prestige but no fruit. They do not bear the thing they were made for. They offer nothing to satisfy the hunger of men. In the nature of things they must wither and pass away. And so with nations. A nation must vindicate its right to exist and develop by the moral life it produces. Wealth, noble buildings, a flourishing commerce are but the leaves upon the tree—pretentious, showy, conveying no nourishment to the true life of the people. A nation that does not bear the fruit of righteousness is rotten at the heart and in the nature of things must wither and pass away as have all the nations of antiquity for that very reason. And so with individuals. Of what use is a showy life, the splendors of dress, the brilliance of education, the charm of culture, the outward advertisement, if the inner life be a sham and if there be an absence of that "fruit" which alone is worthy of us and for which we were created? The time must inevitably arrive when the hypocrisy will be manifest and the withered life appear in all its repulsiveness.

It is in view of the solemnity of these thoughts that we can best understand the word with which our Lord completed his story: "Have faith in God. Whosoever shall say unto a mountain, 'Be thou taken up and cast into the sea' and shall not doubt in his heart but shall believe . . . he shall have it." In this further image Christ expresses a word of infinite hope. When we see life wither, we may well despair. But our Lord forbids us to despair. He turns our heart to God whose power can renew all things and make of the desert a garden. If Israel withers and passes, religion does not die. The church is born and continues to complete the work to which Israel was recreant. If this tree fail, then fruit will be borne by another. The will of God shall be done, if not by this means, then by that. We must live by this faith else shall we perish through despair. For God can lift that which is down and make fruitful that which is barren. Barrenness need not be permanent. The living God can recreate at will. Have faith in God and once again miracles will be wrought. According to our faith will it be unto us.

Knowing Christ through Experience

BY OLIVER M. JOHNSTON

ALL human knowledge has come through experience. There are two ways of discovering truth. One is by reading about it and hearing others tell what they know about it. The other is by finding it through experience. Both methods are necessary, but the latter is by far the more effective. There are many valuable books dealing with the problems of teaching. But every real teacher knows that the most helpful knowledge that he gains comes through his own experience. Skill in any line comes through practice. We learn by doing. The same is true in the realm of the emotions. No one can know the power of love without loving. An appreciation of friendship comes through association with friends. To understand and appreciate the higher and finer qualities of character we must first develop them himself. Sorrow is best known to him who has experienced it. In like manner, by living a happy life one learns what happiness really means.

In the study of literature we have learned that the best part of any author's work is that which grows out of his experience. The things that he has actually thought, felt, and done are the things that distinguish him from other men of letters. Dante's "Divine Comedy" is one of the masterpieces of the world's literature. It is one of those life monuments that measure and test the creative power of the human mind. It is great because it is based on the great experience of the author. This immortal production grew out of the poet's love for Beatrice, his Christian experience, and the hardships of his exile. These are the three greatest experiences of his life and they are the chief sources of his inspiration as a poet. His undying affection for Beatrice is one of the tenderest and most touching love stories in all literature. It was a real experience and this is why it inspired him to write as he did. The "Divine Comedy" was written while the author was in exile. Without his sorrow and the bitter experiences of his exile the poem would have been impossible. Wandering from land to land, he enriched the world's literature with poetic conceptions and episodes that will continue to be read as long as time lasts because they grew out of real life. Back of it all was a great Christian heart, a soul that knew Christ through experience. No wonder the "Divine Comedy" is a great poem. It is built on some of the greatest experiences that humanity has ever known.

Those who are interested in the higher intellectual life know that the real scholar is the one who has gained a knowledge of truth through experience. If one is to become an authority in any field, he must reach the point where he ceases to depend upon the intellectual middle man and come in contact with truth at first hand. Knowledge thus gained is power.

At Caesarea Philippi Jesus asked his disciples what men thought about him. Some said he was John the Baptist; others thought he was Elijah, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. Their indefinite answer was based on second-hand information. When Jesus asked for the thought of his disciples, there was but one answer: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." This reply was based on first-hand knowledge. It was a matter of experience with Peter. He knew the Master personally. He had been associated with him and had felt the power of his presence in his life. The only way to know Jesus is through experience. One might read books about him all of his life without actually knowing him. On the other hand, if his relation to the Master is like that of the branch to the vine, he has knowledge that is definite and an acquaintance that creates a powerful force in his life.

Faith on a Hilltop

By H. CAMPBELL-DUNCAN

UNTIL recently I had labored under the delusion that the two Kansas cities—Kansas City, Kansas, and Kansas City, Missouri—were treeless places laid out flat upon the prairie like toy towns on a table top. I do not know how I got that notion, but there it was. I had passed through them several times, but at night and without leaving my pullman, so I had never really seen them.

My astonishment and delight, therefore, may be imagined when I made my first stop-off visit to see the Baptist Theological seminary at Kansas City, Kansas, and found it crowning the summit of a giant hill and surrounded by magnificent trees.

It was, I suppose, inevitable that, starting out from the Missouri side of the river, I should board the wrong streetcar and in consequence take the longest way round. Had I, however, taken the direct route most of the way would have been through grubby and uninteresting streets, whereas my trolley climbed hills, swept round tree-roofed curves which straightened out to disclose charming vistas and at last deposited me on the crest of a heavily-wooded bluff. A short walk brought me to the terminal of a spur line equipped with one car and a single man for crew. This wound down into a valley skirting the seminary grounds and I dropped off at the gate.

It was a misty, rainy morning. Masses of leaden clouds, split intermittently by snapping ribbons of lightning, surged across the sky. A clean, fresh wind swept the hill, carrying the smell of wet foliage and damp earth—a healthy smell, a stimulating smell, a fragrance to clear the nostrils of the smoky effluvia from cities intent upon the pursuit of perishable, profitless things.

As I mounted the pathway a lusty young squirrel leaped from a tree trunk and rioted across the wet grass to within a few feet of me, haunched himself and gazed with fearless questioning eyes. I passed him the time o'day, but he had already marked me as a stranger and with a sudden leap was gone.

At the top of the hill I turned about. I felt close to the city and yet aloof from it. No one was in sight, only myself, the squirrels and the silent seminary buildings under the wind-tossed trees. Here was a spot where one might feel near to the source of things eternal; a fitting place for prayer and study. And, as I discovered later, it is a devout, earnest and happy colony that lives on that hilltop preparing for work in the wide world beyond.

THE ADMINISTRATION BUILDING, KANSAS CITY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

There is a distinctly homey air about this hilltop campus. Even the architecture is friendly. There is that sensation of peace and fellowship which permeates the rural Christian home. Despite the modernity of the buildings and equipment, I felt a certain atmosphere of unsophistication and simplicity, of withdrawal, as it were, from the sordidness of a workaday world into contemplation and study of higher things, but a happy atmosphere, joyous with the joy of dedication and renunciation.

I do not want to give the impression that the hilltop is not a busy place, for it is, intensely so. In the twenty-five years since the seminary was founded it has gone a long way and accomplished great things. Nor is there any resting upon its laurels. Its field is huge and its ambition to cover it undaunted.

In his office in the administration building I found Dr. J. F. Wells, the field secretary. He greeted me warmly and hurried off to find Dr. Benjamin R. Downer, who has been acting executive and head of the seminary since the recent retirement through ill health of Dr. Philip Wendell Crannell, for twenty-three years the president.

It was quite a simple office, as all things about the seminary are simple. Filing cabinets, plain oak chairs, a steel-doored vault and a large flat-topped desk. On the desk, at which the secretary had been sitting, stood a portable typewriter. Beside it lay a Bible. Each showed signs of long and constant use. To me they told much, far more than I have space for here. One was the chief implement of his work; the other, its inspiration. It was a well-worn book, that Bible, with its limp leather binding, cracked and brown at the edges. I guessed it to have been carried long and far in a coat pocket, always ready to cheer, refresh, stimulate and inspire. It was there on the desk as the typewriter was there, a part of the owner's daily life.

Thus I came upon the keynote of the whole institution. It is, I think, the simple and unquestioning acceptance and practical application of the great spiritual truths contained in the revealed Word of God. The metaphysical speculations and scriptural dissections of higher criticism have little place in the curriculum of the seminary. The Bible is accepted as trustworthy and forms the foundation of all the teaching. Yes, their faith is simple up there on the hilltop, as simple as that of the birds in the glorious campus elms and the squirrels that scamper along the eaves and perch upon the window sills to take the bounty of the students.

Presently came Doctor Downer, calm, quiet, scholarly, a man with gentle smile and direct speech. Accompanied by Doctor Wells, we visited the three buildings which so far constitute the seminary plant and from both men I learned something of the work being done apart from the usual instructional activities.

I heard, too, how the seminary by faith and courage had conquered unnumbered obstacles, and in its twenty-five years of existence had grown from an initial enrolment of four to 114 last year; how it was driven by a changing population from its original quarters in the city and how, through the unsought gifts of a few Christian friends and the boldness to accept heavy financial responsibility it was enabled to move to the hilltop where it now stands, its cupola visible for miles in all directions.

There was nothing spectacular about the seminary's growth. And, by the way, how we do love the spectacular!

How we love to be thrilled with headlines! There are no headlines here. But from its inception there has been no going back, no looking behind. Each year has seen the tides of its influence sweep further up the shore; each year has seen fresh accomplishments and a few more steps taken along the forward path. Kansas City, it must be remembered, was the first seminary west of the Mississippi. Even today its territory is enormous, covering fourteen or fifteen states. Its nearest seminary neighbors are to eastward, Chicago, 450 miles away; southward, Fort Worth, Texas, 500 miles away; westward, Berkeley, Calif., 2000 miles away, and northward—none.

Both my companions exhibited a quiet pride in the physical equipment of the new plant, as well they might. The administration building is a handsome structure containing living quarters for thirty-four men students, nine classrooms, the chapel and the refectory where all, men and women, meet for meals. There is, too, the Pratt-Journey cake library of 9000 volumes, named after the late Rev. John G. Pratt, a pioneer missionary, and the late Rev. Charles Journey cake, last chief of the Delaware Indians, in recognition of generous gifts from relatives and friends.

Across the campus where the engineer's cow crops and ruminates stand the first women's unit and the home for married students. In the former are living quarters for the unmarried women, a delightful parlor with, wonder of wonders for Kansas, an open fireplace, and several study rooms. There also is a combination kindergarten, nursery and playroom for the little folk, children of the married students across the way. The other building was the gift of Mrs. A. M. Auld of Wichita, and contains ten four-room apartments.

So much for the physical aspects of the seminary. They merely represent the vessel from which is poured out a great and far-reaching spiritual influence, for fully 75 per cent of the students are actively engaged in church work, about 50 per cent being full time pastors, filling pulpits over a radius of 100 miles. Workers, too, are sent out into the city where they conduct religious studies among the school children. This is by arrangement with the civic school boards and the children are released at different hours on Wednesday to attend the classes held in various churches. In this work alone there is a field embracing 10,000 Protestant children.

FIRST WOMEN'S UNIT, KANSAS CITY THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY

The work of training women has been extensively developed and the presence of a number of married couples on the campus adds to the general homelike atmosphere of the hilltop. Studies calculated to fit ministers' wives to help their husbands in a practical way, such as stenography, church management, public speaking, church music, child welfare, kindergarten work and household economics, are included.

When it is taken into consideration that the seminary charges not one cent for tuition and that lodging is free and board furnished at, I should say, less than cost, it will be understood that the financial burden is heavy and the need for an adequate endowment pressing.

But, as in the past, those guiding the destiny of the institution are looking forward with hope, knowing that the burden will be lifted and that more buildings will rise—a library, a chapel and dormitories to house more students. And so, as I stood under the trees preparatory to saying farewell it was impossible to remain oblivious to this message of simple faith and spiritual courage emanating from every stick and stone, and I felt when, a few minutes later, I looked back from the bottom of the hill that if the faith that lies within those walls had not in very truth moved mountains, it had at least moved the seminary to the hilltop.

Fighting for Peace

BY WINFRED ERNEST GARRISON

IN THE midst of all the divisive tendencies, conflicting interests and national fears and jealousies which were supposed to be buried with the hatchet at the end of the war, but were not, there is an amazing number of influences making for peace and constructive cooperation in Europe. We in America take peace for granted. We did not believe that we could ever be involved in another war until we were actually in it, and now most of us cannot imagine that we shall ever be involved in another. Even our preparedness enthusiasts—following the wrong plan as some of us believe—have no serious apprehensions about future wars. Europeans indulge in no such complacency. For them the problem of peace is much more urgent because the possibility of war seems more real.

The peace movements in Europe are bewildering in their number and variety. A week at Bierville and a considerable sojourn at Geneva have given a view of some of them, representing widely different types.

The Sixth International Democratic Congress for Peace, held the third week of August at Bierville, near Paris, was a joint assembly of the youth movements of a score of countries under the auspices of "La Jeune Republique." This is a French political party of liberal Catholics whose primary object is to demonstrate that Catholicism is not inconsistent with political and economic liberalism, and to give to the movement for social reform and international good-will the support of religious faith. Youth came by thousands. Half of them came from Germany. Most of them lived in tents furnished by the French war department. It was a camp meeting for the promotion of peace. Many, perhaps most, of those who attended spent the entire month at Bierville, for the two weeks before the Congress and the week after it were filled with a variety of program including a school of international relations, excursions and recreation.

While the auspices, and perhaps a majority of those present, were Catholic (many priests had come with groups of their young people, two bishops were prominent on the program, and the pope sent his blessing by telegraph), there were also many Protestants and some who avowed "non-religious tendencies," and the spirit of cooperation and good-will among them all seemed genuine. It was not, in my judgment, Catholic propaganda under the guise of a peace movement but genuine peace propaganda utilizing the moral resources of the Catholic church. Much was said about the principles of brotherhood and peace in the gospel of Christ and little or nothing about the function or authority of the church. That was doubtless in the background in many minds, but it was not allowed to get into the foreground in the sessions.

The young people who constituted the bulk of the members of the Bierville congress would have gone to a length in making declarations against war and in making them as specific as any one could wish. They would have denounced the wars in Morocco and Syria as readily as they passed resolutions denouncing war in general. But as is often the case with youth movements, there were elderly gentlemen with influence and eloquence always ready to sound the more cautious note. The speeches of these more-than-mature spokesmen for youth (one of them was over eighty) always began with the most liberal sentiments but presently pivoted on a "but" (I think "but" is the most revealing word in the language). General disarmament would be a fine thing, but in the present state of the world, etc. Conscription should be abolished, but so long as nations have armies, etc. The dignity of the individual conscience should be respected by governments in the case of persons who have scruples against war, but individuals also owe a duty to the state, etc. War should be outlawed, but not until a more perfect international organization, etc. Oppressed peoples should receive freedom and justice, but Morocco and Syria are internal questions which the congress ought not to discuss.

And so, youth made vigorous speeches against war, and the elders toned down their resolutions by introducing the factor of "some day, not yet, one step at a time." But for all that it was a great gathering. The international friendships that were formed, the spirit of enthusiasm, the evidence of vast companies of youth all over Europe who are without enmities and who are determined never to stretch out their hands toward each other except in friendship—these things made it worth while. After all, who cares what is said in resolutions passed by mass meetings? Resolutions at such gatherings are a necessary evil, useful but not to be taken too seriously. The world will not be saved from another war by the resolutions of a few thousand volunteer "congressists," but it may be saved by the spirit of Bierville.

The proposal for the outlawry of war could not be brought to a vote. There is little doubt but that the youth of the congress—that is, nine-tenths of the whole—would have been for it. The clearly expressed theory of the leaders was that two things must go together: the abolition of war, and the formation of more compact and efficient international organization for the maintenance of peace and justice. The first cannot come without the second. One speaker said that general disarmament would mean anarchy unless accompanied by perfected machinery for the judicial settlement of disputes. As no one was prepared off-hand to recommend a complete program to attain that end, there was a disposition to consider disarmament resolutions as questions still too hot to touch. Bierville had, therefore, the character of a great throng of radical pacifists whose formal utterances in resolutions were tempered to mildness by considerations of immediate practicability and by a lurking feeling (in the minds of the conservative elders) that, while war is a wasteful way of settling controversies, it had better be kept until we get something better.

At Geneva two weeks later was held the Twenty-Fifth Universal Peace Congress. The first congress in this series was held in 1867, followed almost immediately by the Franco-Prussian war. Here were no bare-legged youth, as at Bierville, but gentlemen and ladies of conventional attire and mature years, many representing peace societies of different countries. Though there were a few of the same faces, the contrasts were striking. There, were 6000; here, 100. There, meetings were held in field and tent and the "theatre de verdure"; here, in the over-ornate Victoria hall. There, they took place in a Catholic setting with a grotto of St. Francis, a tower of Santa Clara and a Calvary; here, three blocks from the reformation monument and close to a Protestant university. Here, thousands of enthusiastic youths manifested the spirit of good-will but had no particular program for ringing about the peace which their hearts desired; here, there was less "Vive la paix!" and more disposition to pass resolutions settling the world. One report of a single committee covered such items as a proposed economic union of the nations, international monetary reform, international control of international trusts.

There was the usual tension between those whose talent was for vague oratory and those who wished to discuss actualities. But even in the discussion of actualities there appeared a disposition to settle large and hard questions with a wave of the hand. A French speaker regretted that the committee which had dealt with the rather ample topics mentioned just before did not also take up the question of interallied debts and thought that the only way to peace is to cancel them all. (Great applause.) An Englishman suggested, first, that war debts ought not to be cancelled until the creditor nations, especially England and the United States, have some assurance that the debtor nations will not spend the money which the cancellation saves them in preparation for more wars; and, second, that if interallied debts are cancelled German reparations ought also to be cancelled. (No applause.)

Parenthetically it may be said that one hears at every cross-road and in every railway compartment endless talk about the urgency and fairness of wiping out the war debts, especially that of France to America, but never a word about any readjustment of Germany's obligations. The argument for cancellation is always based upon the hypothesis that the allies, alike innocent of blame for beginning the war, were comrades in the common cause of repelling a wanton assault upon civilization by one guilty government, a theory which seems to be in need of revision. But few people outside of Germany appear to know that new light has been thrown on the causes of the war since 1918.

No other city within my knowledge has such an atmosphere of internationalism as Geneva. Whether or not the location of the seat of the League of Nations there makes it the capital of the world, it is the local point for the meeting of all sorts of lines of international influence and activity. One feels that as Washington is in the United States but not in any state, so Geneva is neutral ground and not in any nation. Of course it is in Switzerland, but it has been so for only a little more than a century. It still takes pride in calling itself "the republic of Geneva," and its personality is by no means submerged in the confederation. The Genevans are good enough Swiss; but in Switzerland, less perhaps than in any other country, does patriotism interfere with either local loyalties or the international spirit. Whether one deplores America's absence from the roster of the league, or whether one feels that absence is justified by the league's preoccupation with European problems and its entanglement with European politics, one cannot fail to be impressed by the spirit of internationalism which makes Geneva unique. One has there the sense of being circled by a broad horizon. The city is a perpetual peace conference. Doubtless there is plenty of politics played by the representatives of the powers, but it is good to have a place for conference where there are such traditions of liberty, fairness, and righteousness. Much good will come out of Geneva—and perhaps peace will come.

"LOVE is kind" seems such a small, such a trivial thing to say, but it represents the same quality and is of the same character as the love that gave the only begotten Son to die for us sinners on the cross of Calvary.

Standing by the seashore you may watch the tiny waves breaking on the sand in small ripples. Do you know the origin of those ripples, and whence they come? Far away off on the ocean has been a mighty storm. Many a great ship has been wrecked, many lives have been lost, but the only expression of the tossing sea that is left is that little ripple that just reaches your feet as it dies upon the sand.

So it is with love. Out there on the ocean, at Calvary, has been a mighty storm and conflict of love with the powers of sin and darkness; the Saviour has triumphed, and his love has been shed abroad in human hearts, until its tiniest ripple is expressed in some small deed of kindness, some smile of love.—A. T. Schofield in Moody Monthly.

The Devotional Life

The Narrow Way

For narrow is the gate and straitened the way which leadeth unto life, and few be there that find it.—Matthew 7:14.

BY JOHN A. HUTTON

THOSE of us who know anything about life know that every good thing comes to us by a strict and narrow way, and that it is folly to expect that we shall one day find ourselves full-minded, competent people, sure of God and happy in consequence, if we do not now follow the rules.

In fact, everything good that can come to us in this world comes to us on certain conditions to which we must conform.

No boy or man can expect to be able to play up to the end of a game if he never trains. If he does not harden his body with some severe discipline, if he indulges himself and takes no pains, he may do wonderfully for a little while because God may have given him great resources; but soon his "sin will find him out." When he meets men who have gone through the narrow door of training he will simply be beaten.

Success Means Work

No boy or man will expect to succeed in his business or profession if he does not give his heart to it.

If his mind is always on something frivolous, he may do wonderfully for a time because he may have more than average natural ability; but sooner or later his natural strength will wear out, and he will have to confess to himself that he is being beaten, it may even be by inferior men.

A student will never attain to the happiness of real scholarship unless he works. He may have unusual natural ability which enables him to overtake slower minds. But if he depends too much or too long merely on his natural quickness, one day he will find that his mind is not acting with its usual freedom and readiness. He will find, in fact, that he has trifled away something in his nature which was given him not for mere hasty and spasmodic recoveries, but for the building up of his entire character.

We have, all of us, known men of whom we used to say: "So-and-so could be anything he liked." Yet Mr. So-and-so never became anything. He did not understand, or if he understood he did not act upon the understanding, that even our natural faculties forsake us, or act treacherously by us, if they do not compel us to go through the narrow door of industry and painstaking work.

A natural faculty or power is, at best, our opportunity for doing something; but it is the actual deed and performance of our life which proves our spirit—that we have not refused the chance God gave us.

Even when we know that the easy-going, self-indulgent life is a miserable life; even when we know that we are not happy, that on the contrary, we are unhappy; even when we know that we are becoming sour, or hard, or frivolous, or petty, or curious; even when we know that the kind of life on which we have set out is an empty, silly life for people like us; even then we will not turn back. We shall not say to ourselves, "Not another day of this sort of thing for me!" and, turning to Christ, ask, "Lord, is it too late?"

The Two Voices

There are only two voices in this world. There are only two rules for life, for happiness; and they contradict one another. The world says the way to be happy is to do what you like. Christ says, not so. With him agree the whole wisdom and experience of mankind.

There are many things in this life of ours about which it is permissible to have doubts or to keep an open mind. But I believe all the really essential things for character and for the true conduct of life are known beyond all doubt to be what they are. One thing which is quite beyond doubt is that self-indulgence of any kind leads not to happiness but to dreariness, not to fulness but to emptiness, not to the bringing on of a cheerful temper, but to the bringing on of a profound discontent and melancholy; that the so-called life of pleasure simply does not work; that if we live with the one aim of pleasing ourselves we arrive at a day when we do not know what to do with ourselves.

All self-seeking, from the coarsest to the most refined, has one quality of result—to cut us off from the sources of happiness, to make us old before our time, to destroy within us that spring and resiliency of the soul which makes us abound in hope both for this present world and for the world to come.

In the teeth of that wisdom of the world the voice of Christ asserts itself, even as it was in the face of the world, and for a token of the truth unto all men, that God gave up his son to death for us all.

Luxury Destroys Imagination

"There is a way which seemeth good to a man—but at the end thereof are the ways of death." At the end thereof is absence of all natural feeling, absence of all moral enterprise, absence of all calmness and hope in the face of inevitable decay. "I hate luxury," Goethe protested, "it destroys the imagination!"

And there is another way. It is the way of Christ. It is the narrow way. It is the way of the cross; and it is to wayfarers by that holy way that all the promises of God are given. Nay, it is to such wayfarers that even in this world God's promises are fulfilled. For even in this world the way of self-denials is the way of peace. The via crucis is the via lucis, and they only who with deep intention of their souls follow that way have the promise both of this life and of that which is to come.—The British Weekly.

Churches at Work

TOUR THE WORLD IN JANUARY

Every church has been asked to appoint a world tour committee to organize a corps of booking agents for the purpose of securing enrollment. This committee will give personal supervision to the tour in the church. Make haste to get in touch with your committee or pastor and you will be assured of a ticket. The "sailing date" is Jan. 1 and every individual church member and family in the Northern Baptist Convention is invited to go on this extraordinary tour of the world. Around the world in thirty-one days! Make your bookings early.

A QUARTER OF A CENTURY OF CHURCH GROWTH

Dr. Henry K. Carroll, religious statistician of Washington, has made public figures concerning the various elements of church growth during the last quarter of a century. The following statements are interesting and encouraging. In the twenty-five years ending December, 1925, the number of church edifices has increased from 190,805 to 236,964, a net gain of 46,159, which is at the rate of 1846 every year. The total number of regular communicant church members has increased within the same period from 20,085,000 to 44,452,522, a gain of more than 100 per cent in twenty-five years. This is a good record especially since outside attractions are constantly combating regular church attendance.

A PROSPEROUS YEAR

The First church, Kokomo, Ind., reports a banner year, "numerically, spiritually and financially". The church had over $400 on hand after all obligations had been met and every department reported a balance in the treasury. The balance in the missionary treasury was donated to the Howard county hospital. Over $11,000 has been raised during the year and there are many tithers in the church membership.

A NEW HONOR ROLL

Nineteen states, which have turned in more to the unified budget during the present fiscal year than they did last year, constitute the new honor roll. Six states have been given no rank because of delayed reports, either this year or last year, which make comparison impracticable. The arrangement of the nineteen is based on the percentage by which the states surpassed their last year's record. West Washington leads with a gain of almost 50 per cent. The next in line are: North Dakota, New York Metropolitan Board, Missouri, South Dakota, Rhode Island, Delaware, West Virginia, New Jersey, New York state, Wyoming, Michigan, Nebraska, Nevada, Idaho, Kansas, East Washington, Connecticut and South California.

THREE CORNER-STONES

Most churches have one corner-stone laid when erecting a new edifice. More than one is unusual, but the new house of worship now being built at Ocean City, N. J., is unique in having three. It was thought that a principal stone, a stone for the Bible school and one for the visitor's auxiliaries would be appropriate. It is hoped that the structure will be completed by Palm Sunday.

The Bible school is worthy of mention. Numbering about 100, the school undertook to raise $200 a year for five years, a total of $1000, taking an extra collection for this amount each Sunday. In the first year it has actually raised $426, which is doing nobly.

INDEPENDENT MISSIONARIES.

A church recently wrote a denominational field worker saying that it had been solicited by letter for funds for a missionary who was working independently in China. The denominational worker wrote back to the church, giving the reasons why he believed that it was better to send funds through a mission board. Parts of his letter may be of interest to other churches, so we are quoting from it here.

"I am glad that you have referred to me the matter of sending mission funds to China. It is far better, in my judgment as a former missionary, to send funds through a regular board. Then if a missionary fails in health or dies, the board will continue to carry on the work which he began.

"The work of our Baptist board is conducted on the most economical scale consistent with efficiency. This fact is borne out in the new missionary atlas of the world, which shows that there are in India and Burma about two and one-quarter million Christians, nearly 200,000 of whom are related to the work of our society.

"Or to put it in another way: Of the ten leading missionary societies having the largest work in India, the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society is

Third in total expenditure in United States dollars;

First in total receipts from native sources;

First in number of missionaries;

First in number of schools;

Second in number of native workers;

First in number of communicants; and

First in number of converts baptized last year."

NOW "ON THEIR OWN"

It is always good to hear of churches which assume self-support, thus releasing the aid they receive to some other needy field. The Falls City church, Nebraska, under the leadership of Rev. M. McPherson, voted to become self-supporting beginning Oct. 1. The church took this step after a careful study of its ability and an every-member canvass. Congratulations also go to the church at Montrose, Colo., which assumes self-support Nov. 1.

PACEMAKERS

Enviably records are those indicating the adoption, the full payment and the over-payment of missionary quotas. For the first five months of the new fiscal year, the Judson church, Denver, has sent in more than one-twelfth of its quota each month. Minnesota has many banner churches. The church at Spring Valley is meeting its missionary apportionment and the First church of Alden has adopted the full quota for mission work this year. The church in West Duluth overpaid the missionary quota last year by one-third and this year its apportionment has been increased more than 100 per cent. What these churches have accomplished other churches could do readily if pastor and people gave the same earnest attention to the missionary cause.

MISSIONARY FACTS AVAILABLE

The excellent summary of the leading facts about Baptist missions which was prepared by Rev. Homer F. Yale, Whitney Point, N. Y., is now in mimeographed form for distribution. This concise statement can be used to good advantage as the outline of a sermon or for reference.

YOUR CHURCH WORK

IN BURMA

Here is a reminder of the results which are obtained when churches work in the interest of missions. The several hundred boys and girls of the Central Lahu school, formerly located at Kengtung, Burma, are now using the new plant at Loimwe. The change from the plain to the hills means better health for these children of hills people; 300 acres of land which are described as having been formerly "a howling wilderness and tiger camp" are being turned into fields of cultivated crops. Indian corn and potatoes are being raised for the use of the school by the boys. Rev. J. H. Telford is putting in a waterwheel to pound rice. This will mean the release to more profitable work of the forty boys whose services are required for the preparation of one day's supply of rice for the school.

The Chimney Corner

Beef Stew and Manliness

JUST why an unkind fate should designate the gentleman seated at my right, outfitted immaculately in a freshly cleaned and pressed Palm Beach suit, as the victim whose spotless lap should stop the descent of that plate of beef stew, is quite beyond me, for there were many other laps present, including my own, which would have suffered a less noticeable disfigurement than the lap of Palm Beach, writes J. M. R. in the Expositor.

The embarrassment and regret of the little lady of the starched white apron from whose busy hands the plate had slipped, was genuine. Big tears welded up as though to quench the flame of flush which had flared up over her cheeks.

Palm Beach suits and beef stews both function most satisfactorily in their own proper field and the encroachment of one upon the other has ever resulted disastrously. A moist towel removed the surplus. The Palm Beach suit absorbed the remainder. Nor could it be hidden, for the coat was single breasted.

The manager stepped up. "We are sorry that happened, sir," he said. "Have the suit cleaned and we shall pay the bill."

Instantly the patron replied, "If you give me your word that the company will pay the bill, I'll bring it in, but I won't if that girl has to pay it."

Murder, my friends, is not the only thing that will "out." Honest manhood, a Christian concern for the welfare of others, chivalry, though oft thought interred, will "out" even in a busy, bustling city, where neighbor is not supposed to know neighbor and where, 'tis said, man is so intent upon the quest for the almighty dollar that he has lost his sense of values other than monetary. That lie is nailed continuously as I saw it nailed yesterday. There had not been the half expected outburst of outraged dignity. No voice had been raised in harsh invectives. An unfortunate accident had happened, as is their wont, yet it was a blessing in disguise, for it brought in a forceful way, the fact to our attention who sat nearby, that faith in man is a faith well placed. There are exceptions, it is true, but such as he of the Palm Beach suit are legion and go their way through life adding much to the beauty and attractiveness of this old ball of clay. Often it calls for a misplaced platter of beef stew to show them up, yet they are all about us and it does one's heart good to find them. When the quiet spirit of such a one goes walking abroad through the heart and heat of a rushing city, I for one, must click my heels and stand at a salute.

My Epitaph

*I DO not want an epitaph upon my grave.
I know, full well, death levels all—

Contacts

CONTACTS are vital things.

No one can escape them; or the result of the influence of his own contacts with life, not even though he be a hermit hiding in a woods.

No one can brush up against a man without to some extent affecting him.

The set of this man's shoulders may determine the set of another's; the frown on his face may darken another's outlook on life; the cheerfulness of his countenance may lead another again to laughter; the zest with which he tackles a job may inspire another with a stronger grip on his work. The "smile-and-then-another-smiles-until-there-are-miles-and-miles-of-smiles" principle will work as certainly in the opposite direction.

Conscious contacts count for something; but they do not begin to total the results that the unconscious contacts do. In the unconscious contacts the real

Thoughts

FLEET are the feet of wandering thoughts.

*How fast, how far they run!
Swift as a frightened meteor's flight
And far as the farthest sun.*

Halting and slow thought feet may move—

*At rest they can never be—Slow is their pace when they thread the path
Of some baffling mystery*

*Softly and still thought footsteps fall,
As a feathery flake of snow.
One listener only their steps can hear,
Wherever they may go.*

*Guard well the feet of thy restless thoughts;
Keep them in strict control;
For on thy secret thoughts depends man is giving himself; in the conscious it is often the mask of a man assumed for the occasion.

You cannot gaze at a mountain day after day, week after week, and year after year, without absorbing something of its stability and grandeur. You cannot make a habit of wandering through the solitude of great forests beneath majestic trees without absorbing as a part of your own nature the gift of pregnant silence. Communion with nature carries with it a gift the antithesis to the result of communion with a gabbling human.

As surely as the sun rises, so surely do ennobling contacts enrich the personality. That which stunts the soul should be avoided as a physical poison would be shunned.

What to Feed Little Children

AFTER the child reaches the age when he is old enough to eat at the table with the grown-ups and partake to some extent of their meals, it is often a puzzle to inexperienced mothers to know just what foods may safely constitute the child's heavy meal of the day—which should be at noon and never in the evening. The Philadelphia Health Society sends the following helpful dinner suggestions for children from two to six years old.

Soup: One-third to one cup vegetable soup (best if made with milk).

Meat, fish or egg: One to two tablespoonfuls of chicken, beef or lamb, finely cut, or one or two tablespoonfuls of white fish such as cod, flounder, haddock or oysters, baked, boiled or creamed. Do not give egg at noon if given at breakfast.

Potatoes: One to two tablespoonfuls baked, mashed or creamed—never fried; one to two tablespoonfuls of one or more vegetables besides potatoes. Mash or chop finely. Greens, such as spinach, Swiss chard, beet tops, cabbage or lettuce are especially valuable.

Bread: One or two slices—spread thinly with butter.

Milk: One cup or glass—eight ounces.
Desserts or fruit: One-half to one cup of any plain pudding, such as custard, junket, cornstarch, rice or tapioca. Ice cream may be given occasionally. Stewed or fresh fruit may be given in place of milk dessert.

Says Jimmy in a "composition" on water: "Sometimes water's fresh and sometimes it ain't. When it ain't it's salt or maybe it's just old. It ain't any color except when it's in the lake and then sometimes it's blue. If it's in a wash-bowl it's sort of whitish except after you wash your hands and then it's black."

BOYS and Girls

What Timmy Said to a Lady

By "PEGGY"

YEARS ago when little brother Timmy was even smaller than he is now, embarrassed us all dreadfully by saying something to a certain lady who came to call on our family. But we never knew what a remarkable thing Timmy's remark did to that lady until a little while ago. It is such fun to know the sequel to these stories, especially of true stories, that I thought you'd like to know about this one, and also to read the poem on this page "It Shows in Your Face."

You see, this lady had had a lot of trouble. She had been engaged to marry a wonderful man and he had been killed in the dreadful war. She was lonely and sad after this, so she decided the nicest thing in the world to do would be to find some people just as sad and cheer them up. So she adopted two French orphans whose parents had been killed in the war, the same dreadful war, bombs which exploded over their little village. Both these children were as pale as shadows when they reached America, afraid of every sound and afraid of everybody because of the terrors they had been through, which makes you see that a bad thing war is—scaring children and starving children and making them orphans. This lady tried to feed two little orphans and to love them to happiness; but one of them was too old to live any longer and died, and the other one was so frail that he never grew strong, but just lived on and on and was a big anxiety to our dear lady. She tried to try so hard to be gay and cheerful to encourage this poor little boy, and she has come to love her dearly. His big brown eyes follow her wherever she goes, and he himself has never been able to stand, he just sits in a cripple's chair. So our dear lady has only something sad, you can see.

One day a good many years ago she came to our house to call. All of a sudden Timmy began walking round and round her, in circles, as she sat in our armchair. It was too funny of him. We laughed!

"What in the world are you doing, you little fellow?" she asked.

"I'm looking for the word," Timmy

"the word? What word?"

"Why, mother said if ever anybody had a character written all over her face as you. But I can't see it anywhere!"

Our dear Timmy patted her lovely face just to show her it was quite all right. We were all much embarrassed about it. I remember yet how Uncle Timmy's eyes, just as if he had been crying, only men really don't cry, you know.

None of us ever knew any more about this story until a few weeks ago when the lady sent Timmy a wonderful set of books for his birthday. "Dear Timmy," she wrote, "one day you gave me the loveliest compliment of my life. I was as blue as indigo that day and felt I was a miserable failure, but you cheered me up wonderfully, and since this is your birthday I want you to have this set of books with my very best love."

We were all thrilled over this present and have been enjoying the books a great deal. We learned our lesson from it, how kind it is to pass on something lovely to people, for you never know how lonely or discouraged they may be.

The Three Sieves

ONCE upon a time, there was a fairy.

And once upon the same time there was a girl. She was a bright girl who talked a great deal; in fact, she talked so much that she often told things much better left unsaid. So she went to the fairy about it. "I get into trouble when I talk," she complained.

"No wonder," said her good fairy, "I shall have to give you these three sieves. Take them and use them always before you speak."

Now the name of the first sieve was: "Is it true?" The name of the second sieve was: "Is it kind?" And the name of the third sieve was: "Is it necessary?" So after that the girl rarely had much trouble because she kept right on using the three sieves, and while she talked

It's in Your Face

You don't have to tell how you live each day;

You don't have to say if you work or you play;

A tried, true barometer serves in the place—

However you live, it will show in your face.

The false, the deceit that you bear in your heart

Will not stay inside where it first got a start;

For sinew and blood are a thin veil of lace—

What you wear in your heart, you wear in your face.

If your life is unselfish, if for others you live,

For not what you get, but how much you can give;

If you live close to God in his infinite grace—

You don't have to tell it, it shows in your face.

They Worked in China— Do You Know Them?

(These are all well-known missionaries but their names have become terribly twisted. The corrected list will be given next week on our page.)

1. TROBRE SINORROM went to China the first of all missionaries, but was so unwanted that the poor man had to live in a veritable cellar, with closed shutters; he even wore Chinese clothes and had to bribe some one to teach him Chinese so that he could translate the entire Bible into Chinese. Do you know his name?

2. TREEP KPAPRE was the first medical missionary in China, in fact, it is said that "he opened China at the point of a lancet," because he operated on so many eyes that he actually made the blind see and became, of course, tremendously popular. Surely you know his name.

3. SHUDNO LYTORA had dreamed all his life of going to China, for even as a boy he used to read and hope and wish "China", the one magic word of his heart. When he finally reached China he had numerous adventures as he carried China inland, trusting God to help him every inch of the way; for he walked through dangers untold starting what is now called "the China Inland Mission." You ought to know his name—do you?

4. MESAJ MILGURO lived among the wildest people in all China, the Mongols. This particular hero of ours lived such a lonely life among these treacherous wild people that he has often been called "China's Robinson Crusoe," as day after day, alone, he trudged over hills blue with forget-me-nots to the dirty Mongolian villages in the next valley—then the next, the next, the next. For he was never content to be comfortable! He forded dangerous rivers and slept in vile places and won the hearts of wild people. You will be proud to know his name, won't you?

5. HONJ THENNEK ZACIMKEEN was "China's beloved physician"; but you must not suppose that he leaped into this love with ease, at once, for he had years of anxious waiting. Once, just after he had finished praying with some other Christians that God would make the great Li Hung-Chang favor Christian physicians, word came that the great viceroy's wife was dangerously ill and Dr. — was summoned. It was a true answer to the prayer, and he became exceedingly popular in his part of China. You can guess his name, can't you?

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on Devotional Topic for November 14 RECREATIONS FOR YOUTH

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in "Young People's Leader," the official magazine "For All Baptist Young People". Subscriptions to the "Leader" may be made through the B. Y. P. U. of America, at $1 per year.)

This material as given in the Leader is quite complete and will afford you a basis for preparing your meeting in an interesting and impressive way.

One statement may here be emphasized: this material is merely suggested for your use. If you have your own ideas on the way this meeting should be lead, or if you prefer to work out another method of presentation, you are free to do so. This material does not bind you in your presentation. It is more a "point of departure" from which you may get your own ideas to working.

No matter what method you use, the material given in "Talking It Over" in the Leader will be helpful. This suggests points which should be brought out in the meeting and gives plenty of room for discussion.

If, during the "Hundred Yard Dash" suggested in the track meet idea, you want to find out how the different forms of recreation can be graded, score cards may be obtained at two cents each (plus postage) from Mr. Lynn Rohrbough, 510 Wellington ave., Chicago, Ill. From him you may also get "Leisure-time Activities" cards which could be used effectively in your meeting in order to find out where most of the young people present spend their leisure time. These cards may be had for one and a half cent each, plus postage.

Try to have as one of the outcomes of this meeting the formation of teams for organized play, and a good social program in addition. If your group has this already, perhaps you could interest all the young people of the church in these affairs.

Open House

The well-known Southern hospitality is displayed in the plans of the Columbia federation of B. Y. P. U. (Washington, D. C.), for their "open house".

All those who attend the thirty-sixth annual convention of Baptist young people in Philadelphia, July 6-10, are invited to visit Washington, D. C., either on the way to or from the convention city. The doors of the city and the hearts of the Baptist young people will be open to these delegates.

One of the large hotels in the city has been designated as the "house" at which delegates are urged to stay. Reduced rates have been arranged for at the hotel and with bus companies.

Since Washington, D. C., is but two hours' ride from the convention city, many of the Baptist young people will want to stop off and visit the "pride of the nation". If you are planning to stop off in Washington, either by yourself or with a group, communicate with the president of Columbia federation, John Ruthven, 2-5 Center Market, Washington, D. C., and he will see to it that your visit is made enjoyable.

A New "Red Book"

Many of you are familiar with the "Red Book" of popular fiction and some of you may hurry to the news stand each month for your copy. Now there is on the market a new "Red Book" magazine for people to read. We hope you will hurry to get your copy of this, too.

The contents of this new "Red Book" are varied and of good reading value. In addition to that they are helpful and practical. This "Red Book" should be in the hands of all religious education workers of all local churches.

What is this "Red Book"? It is a new loose-leaf binder containing leaflets of suggestions on religious education for the local church. Because this is put out by the religious education department of the American Baptist Publication Society, and because the cover of this is red, the name is doubly fitting.

If you want the religious education work of your church to make great strides, and if you want modern ways of doing things, just get a copy of this latest "Red Book" for your files. It is fifty cents.

Readers in Assam

There is proof in the following letter that the "Meeting Helps" on this page are used. Here's a greeting from far-off Assam.

Kangpokpi, Imphal,
Manipur, Assam, India.

Dear Sir:

In regard to material in your first column on 760 of THE BAPTIST July 24, you may be interested to know how is done in my house and may be able to pass on the thought to the inspiration of some of your young folks. Besides the translations you there mention (except that we do not have Goodspeed's) we have seven others and the Greek, and are thus putting the New Testament in another of many languages of the world. There are about 150 in Assam alone. In this native state where we now have several thousand Christians there are no less than twelve in about half of which we are constantly working. Tell some of your boys if they want a good hard job and a great time to get ready and come along—yes, and girls, too, for we need a teacher and a nurse right now.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed)

G. C. CROZIER.

They Worked in China

6. REGGOE SILLEE YAMAC went to the island of Formosa where he was known as their "Black-Bearded Barbarian" because of his big black beard. But he braved everything from fierce head-hunters to even fiercer persecution in order to teach the good news of Jesus. What was his name?

7. NEELOAR SETTUNCH is the misspelled name of a wonderful woman doctor, very young and beautiful. The Chinese in her town misunderstood her errand and the message of the Christian and killed them all, including this true marvelous doctor, whose last act on earth was binding up the wounds of a small boy hurt in the mob of excited grown-ups; she tore up part of her skirt to use as a bandage. You will love her name!

8. ARMY RILLORM was another heroine; for when the Boxer soldiers threatened to kill every Christian in the building, this slender, delicate little person actually went out the front doors to face the howling mob and to offer her own life as a substitute for all those in doors! Her's is a name to remember forever! China's greatest soldier today, General Feng (you often see his picture in the newspapers)—is a Christian because of his admiration for her brave stand.

Among Ourselves

Another Detroit Shock

By JOHN W. ELLIOTT

SECRETARY FOR RELIGIOUS AND RACIAL EDUCATION OF THE PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

DETROIT surpasses all other American cities in the production of shocks. A recent shock surprised and injured more people than all the shocks produced by an entire day's output of this great automobile city. When the Y. M. C. A. of Detroit recalled an invitation to William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, to address a mass meeting under its auspices, the shock was felt by Christian leaders from coast to coast. Those who know Mr. Green recognize his sterling worth and rejoice in his Christian attitude and service. His conduct during the Detroit experience was a wonderful testimony to Christian training and faith. The Federal Council commission on churches and social service has for several years arranged for labor leaders and their own members to address the churches of the community in which the American Federation of Labor holds its annual sessions. Such an attempt was made in Detroit. The purpose of these efforts is to acquaint church members with labor ideals and to interpret Christian ideals and principles to labor leaders. The plan met with splendid success until this year. Only sixteen churches opened their doors to the speakers of the commission, of whom not more than five were labor men.

While nothing could be farther from the purpose of the writer than to condemn the unfortunate incivility of the Detroit Y. M. C. A., in all fairness it must be said that the local Y. M. C. A. and the pastors of the city found themselves in a difficult situation. The great automobile industry of Detroit, always opposed to labor unionism, has seen to it that its employees have never been organized. The board of commerce of Detroit, naturally reflecting the attitude of the capitalists of industry, loses no opportunity to oppose any attempt to organize Detroit labor. The board of commerce insured that the efforts of the Federal Council commission to place speakers in local pulpits constituted an attempt to aid in organizing the 700,000 employees of Detroit. The board of directors of the board of commerce issued an urgent appeal in the Detroit of Sept. 27 to the churches to close their doors against men who are admittedly attacking our government and our American plan of employment. Among the men so labeled were several consecrated and outstanding denominational secretaries. The appeal carried great force. It closed the pulpits of many of the churches. It left the board of managers of the Y. M.

C. A. promptly withdraw the invitation extended to Mr. Green by the general secretary and announce publicly that the invitation had been extended by an employee without the board's knowledge and consent.

The unfortunate part of the episode is the probable reaction of labor toward the churches. It will give comfort to that group which contends that we must look beyond the churches for the religion of Jesus. The Detroit Y. M. C. A. is in the midst of a building campaign. A large sum has been subscribed of which three millions came from five contributors. It is only natural for labor leaders to infer that the Y. M. C. A. was afraid of losing the support of these donors. Another unfortunate result is probable, labor leaders may interpret the attitude of the Detroit Y. M. C. A. and churches as the attitude of all Y. M. C. A.'s and churches. The members of the Federal Council commission assured the delegates to the American Federation of Labor that the Detroit attitude was by no means characteristic of the American Christianity. Mr. Green did not need this assurance, for he is a devout Christian gentleman, a member of a Baptist church. He has addressed the Presbyterian General Assembly and the Northern Baptist Convention and other great bodies of Christians. But the Detroit board of the Y. M. C. A. refused to let him speak on a Christian platform in their city. It's a shock.

District of Columbia

By HENRY W. O. MILLINGTON

PROBABLY the most interesting recent event in the Baptist life of the nation's capital was the opening for worship of the new edifice of the National Baptist Memorial to Religious Liberty.

A Challenge Answered

A WELL-KNOWN pastor in a message to his people spoke of the prayer-meeting as "the most important meeting of the church." The correctness of the statement being questioned, the pastor justified it in these words:

"The church prayer meeting is supremely important because everything to be desired as the result of the church's work is definitely promised in answer to united prayer: conversions; additions; holier living by members; influence for good in the community. All these and more, if not specifically conditioned on united prayer, are promised to follow it."

This church has been known as the Immanuel church but henceforth its name will be as given above. The new building has not been dedicated but the church is using it in its regular services, opening its doors to the public on Sunday, Oct. 3, with congregations that more than filled the building at both services. In the morning the pastor, Dr. Gove G. Johnson, preached on the theme "For Glory and for Beauty," and in the evening, on "A Crucified and Exalted Saviour." A special communion service was held at four. The new organ was played for the first time at these services by Percy S. Foster, well-known in religious circles, especially among Baptist congregations, as an inspiring leader of music.

The National Baptist Memorial to Religious Liberty, called also the Roger Williams memorial, was launched in 1917 by the Northern and Southern Conventions jointly, and two years later amounts were placed in the budgets of these conventions for its erection.

The site was dedicated when the Southern Convention met in Washington in 1920, and ground was broken by President Harding in 1921. Secretary of State Hughes laid the corner-stone in 1922. Since then the work has gone on, until now the interior is finished and furnished for occupancy. The property value of the present structure, including the old building, is more than $500,000.

The old front will be changed to suit the stone and style of the new structure and the stone and concrete terracing and balustrading will complete the architect's exterior design. On the adjoining lot on Fifteenth street the erection of a modern Sunday-school building is planned.

The pews are being provided, in part, by the Baptist state conventions of the North and South, and each state is to have its pew marked with its name. The four main windows are to be permanent memorials of the home and foreign mission enterprise, two for the North and two for the South. The proposed statue of Roger Williams will be placed in the front of the exterior. The first contribution toward it was received from the late Oscar Straus. The memorial room at the base of the tower is to receive such memorials and documents of Baptist history as may fittingly commemorate its principles and its pioneers. Doctor Johnson and his people are to be congratulated on having carried this great enterprise so near to completion.

Rev. J. C. Killian recently visited Washington, rendering an excellent service to a number of our churches by developing a new financial and spiritual morale. His genial manner, hearty enthusiasm and convincing way of presenting matters commends him to all our people. He impressed our ministers by an address which he delivered at the pastor's conference Oct. 11.

Revival meetings are being held at the West Washington church, Rev. C. B. Austin, pastor, assisted by Rev. H. C. Whitner. The Fountain Memorial church, Rev. W. J. Hubbard, pastor, is also in the midst of a revival. The pastor is being assisted by the Rev. G. H. Wiley, of Richmond, Va.

Wisconsin News Notes

By R. C. SPEER

DR. F. A. Agar and Miss Helen K. Wallace have finished a few days' engagement in Wisconsin, visiting Janesville, Green Bay and Milwaukee, Grace church. They will return for visits at Evansville and Neenah Nov. 18, 19.

Dr. John M. Moore, general secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has been secured as the annual speaker of the Milwaukee Council of Churches early in December. He will speak in Baptist pulpits on Sunday and at the council meeting on Monday night, meeting the ministers of all the denominations at Monday luncheon. Mr. E. J. Steinberg, Baptist layman, is president and Rev. R. C. Speer of Tabernacle church, chairman of the department of religious education of the Council of Churches.

Wisconsin Draws from Outside

Rev. G. F. Reichel, from Swope Park church, Kansas City, Mo., is happily located at Bay View church, Milwaukee.

A public reception given by his church Oct. 15 was attended by many Baptist ministers, officials of the state convention and friends of the church.

Rev. Frederick Donovan of Dell Rapids, S. D., begins his work with the church at Dodgeville, Wis., Nov. 1. This is a fine village field where real men are raised. One Milwaukee church has its leading tenor, deacon, and state president of B. Y. P. U. in Dr. C. M. Wilcox, and also the present president of its B. Y. P. U. from that little church. Other churches have been similarly blessed by the men who have been produced in Dodgeville church. Mrs. W. S. Lincoln, state worker for the Wisconsin Baptist Convention, is a member there. Rev. Mr. Donovan comes to a church with a good building, numerous young people and a splendid folk among whom to work.

Rev. Geo. B. Davis, South church, Milwaukee, has been made chairman of the Milwaukee Baptist Ministers' Association, Rev. Andrew Martin of West Allis, secretary. The association meets monthly, a guest of the pastors in turn. The next meeting will be held at Oconomowoc with Rev. W. L. Harms.

Work that Counts

Regardless of daily paper headlines or even notices in the denominational press, the work that counts for the kingdom is when pastors and churches study the needs of their fields and set about a program which will satisfy those needs. Some such fine work is being done at

Clinton where Rev. A. W. Stephens led his church at its annual meeting to change its fiscal year to coincide with the state and Northern Baptist Conventions, May 1-May 1. This church takes part in the week-day church school, the pastor teaching two grades on release time. It cooperates with the Presbyterian church, all children of both churches studying with both pastors teaching. The school is held in the Baptist church. This church has also recently provided for the reception of "associate members."

At Beloit, Rev. R. N. McDonald, pastor, has led the church in reducing its indebtedness $24,000, in trebling its Sunday-school attendance in twelve months and in forming a men's club with fifty members. Mr. McDonald is in demand as outside speaker. He spoke recently at the Milwaukee Baptist Association young peoples' evening.

On the small and difficult field at Kendall great work is being done. Rev. J. MacOwan Wilson, pastor, recently visited Beaver Dam and was the preacher over the week end. His daughter, Dorothy, is a senior at Wayland academy there. When young people leave his church to go to the city he reports them to the nearest Baptist minister. What a blessing to our young people it would be if other pastors would follow his example.

Rev. Chas. W. Powell has become pastor at Knapp-Woodville-Cady Creek. Reports from the field indicate progress.

The church at Lancaster gave him a farewell and wished him Godspeed in his new work. This man and field should prove the value of three or more small churches uniting under a pastor who serves the entire field as a unit. Several smaller churches in Wisconsin are thus united in service.

There are five of our best young women studying at the Baptist Missionary Training school this year. These, with the number of young people in other schools and colleges who are preparing for Christian service, show that there is a constant line of recruits, many coming from unexpected places, to fill the ranks of leadership.

Mrs. N. Bowstead, formerly church sitor of First church, Milwaukee, has returned to that post again and is at work setting the parish in order. The church hopes soon to be able to locate the right man for pastor.

Rev. F. L. King from the Oklahoma Indian field was missionary speaker in Wisconsin associations this year. During the thirty-seven days in our territory he spoke frequently, each time arousing new interest in his work.

Mrs. E. C. Williams, charter member of South Baptist church forty years ago, and grandmother of Miss Elsie Appen, was buried in Milwaukee Oct.

Dr. D. W. Hulburt, lifelong friend, assisted Pastor R. C. Speer in the funeral services.

Rhode Island News

By LILLIAN M. CHACE

SEPTEMBER 13 the first of twenty-seven regional conferences on evangelism was held in First church, Providence. These conferences are being held from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Leading speakers of the denomination brought messages of inspiration and personal interpretation to the several hundred delegates representing Rhode Island and southeastern Massachusetts in connection with the program which will be developed in the churches between now and Easter.

The excellent program and the warm evangelistic spirit which awakened were due largely to the careful preparation made for the conference by Rev. William T. Green, of Natick, and his associate, Dr. E. Carlton Herrick, formerly of Fall River.

The state committee on evangelism promoting a strong program in the associations and churches. The hope is that every church in our convention will adopt at least one method of evangelism and prosecute it during the year.

Rhode Island Baptists will rejoice to learn that our state is on the honor list contributors to the denominational program. In the last report issued by the Board of Missionary Cooperation, Rhode Island ranks first among the New England conventions and ninth among thirty-six conventions of the Northern Baptist Convention. This is due largely to the fact that several churches have pledged their apportionment in full and are forwarding one-twelfth of it to the state headquarters each month.

Rhode Island Baptists have been honored in the election of J. Willard Baker to the chairmanship of the Board of Missionary Cooperation of the Northern Baptist Convention. This is the central promotional agency of the denomination. To it is committed the gigantic task of informing people regarding our Twenty Thousand or Twenty-five Thousand—Which Shall It Be?

By HERBERT W. VIRGIN

AS chairman of the publicity committee looking toward the entertainment of the Northern Baptist Convention, during the week May 31-June 5, 1927, I have raised the question which is the caption of this article. The first number, 20,000, was given by Dr. Johnston Myers, executive secretary of the entertainment committee; the second, by Dr. J. Whitcomb Brougher, president of the Northern Baptist convention. Both have reference to the possible attendance of such hosts of Baptists as the numbers represent. Dr. Johnston Myers started the slogan of 20,000 at the first meeting of the entertainment committee and insisted that there was not only the possibility but the probability that we might have 20,000 Baptists attending the convention in May. When he telegraphed to Doctor Brougher asking for suggestions, Doctor Brougher replied that he believed that 25,000 Baptists could be so impressed with the importance of the next convention that they would make all plans to be present.

Acting upon the suggestion made by these two splendid brethren, the committee on entertainment has already engaged the Chicago coliseum which can easily seat 20,000 and can be arranged to seat, if necessary, 32,000, for when the Republican national convention was held there 32,000 people were seated.

I cannot conceive of anything that would give greater impetus to the work of the denomination than for an army of 25,000 enthusiastic Baptists to come together and face with optimistic determination any problem of our denomination, and to determine to measure up to all of the opportunities which our conquering Lord is thrusting upon us.

The coliseum is one of the few buildings that can accommodate so vast a crowd, and it is a rare building in the sense that it is possible for an ordinary speaker to be heard by every one. In order to make this certain, amplifiers will be arranged throughout the building, so that without any effort whatsoever the individual farthest from the speaker will be able to hear as if he were but a few feet from him. Every conceivable accommodation is found in this building and perfect arrangements will be made to make the vast throng satisfied, as far as the meeting place is concerned.

What about you, my Baptist brother or sister? Won't you put down in your calendar the convention dates and arrange to be one of the 25,000 present at this great gathering of northern Baptists?

world program and raising six and a half million dollars a year to finance it. Mr. Baker is an executive of proved ability and has an intimate knowledge of denominational needs and resources. Wallace L. Pond, another Rhode Island Baptist has been appointed a member of the board of managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. No more interested and eager student of our missionary enterprise has been named for this important position. Mr. Pond will give his trained powers and consecrated abilities to the service of the board.

Miss Ethel L. Ryan of the Crow Indian mission, Montana, has completed a schedule of speaking appointments in our state. She has the passion of a Christian missionary and her words carry conviction. She is the first of a long line of strong missionaries whom we are planning to itinerate in Rhode Island during the present year.

The Minnesota State Convention

By KATHERINE K. GALE

THE sixty-seventh annual meeting of the Minnesota State Convention was held at Rochester Oct. 11-13. It was the largest convention in many years; people crowded the halls for every session. Since the regional evangelistic conference was combined with the convention, there were only three meetings of the convention proper. "To know Christ and reveal him to others" was the central theme of all the sessions.

The opening banquet was attended by over 400 persons; Doctor Fujii of Tokio Tabernacle offered grace. Gov. Theodore Christianson gave a magnificent address on the spirit of Christianity in its application to civic life. James L. Kraft of Chicago emphasized the same thought in his talk on "The Measure of a Man," stating that with one exception the heads of the largest legitimate businesses in the United States are active Christians. Miss Mable McVeigh, foreign secretary of the woman's foreign mission society, struck the same note in her talk, "The Christian Way of Life."

One of the outstanding addresses of the convention was given by Dr. Alonzo Petty of Los Angeles on "The Dynamic for Missions". Prof. A. Z. Mann of Hamline university illustrated his address on the rural problem with statistics which were the result of extensive research. He declared that only three rural churches out of ten are receiving efficient religious education, and plead for a rural ministry able to present a program of education and social interest which would hold the young people and challenge the interest of the older people of the community.

Miss Anna Hagquist, a trained nurse who was forced to return from the Congo because of ill health, read a letter from one of the native converts who wrote, "Every time we young people meet we pray God to restore you to health and bring you back to us." The first part of the prayer is answered. It is up to us to accomplish the rest.

Dr. J. C. Richardson of Burma declared that ideals of the Baptist mission in Burma are absolute honesty, educational efficiency, and evangelism, first, last and always by both missionaries and students.

Owing to the crowded program, the women's meetings were confined to two short luncheon programs, and a fine report of the year's work by Mrs. Stewart.

The evangelistic conference began Tuesday evening. J. C. Massee delivered a gripping address from the text, "The glorious gospel of the blessed Lord which was committed to my trust". The convention keynote throbbed in this message and we were lifted to new heights of desire and purpose as ambassadors in the ministry of reconciliation. S. G. Neil of Philadelphia conducted the school of methods speaking on the Biblical authority for evangelism. He enjoined his hearers to keep everlastingly at it, and gave many helpful suggestions.

An unusual feature of the conference was an open forum followed by a period of prayer. R. W. Babcock led in the first discussion, "Preparing the Church for Evangelism". Ten sub-topics were suggested and discussed in two-minute talks from the floor. The second discussion, "How to Get Results," was led by John L. Barton, Sioux Falls, S. D.

Morning and afternoon hours of prayer were conducted by Earle V. Pierce and W. B. Riley. Specific requests were made and prayed for. The presence of God was deeply felt at these sessions. It was a touching and dramatic scene when, at the close of the second hour many parents, in tears, came forward asking prayers for their children.

The convention reached a high plane. Christ was exalted in every session. An earnest desire for a true revival, a deep sense of personal responsibility and a strengthened purpose to know Christ better and to reveal him to others in his saving power were the outstanding thoughts in the hearts of the delegates and visitors who attended.

South Dakota State Convention

By A. B. CLAYPOOLE

THE South Dakota Convention met with First church, Huron, S. D., Oct. 6-10. The attendance was large and representative and the sessions were filled with inspiration and instruction. There was no sign of dissension. The main objective and accomplishment of the convention was to equip the Baptists of South Dakota for better and more intensive service to the Lord. The motto was: "Youth for Christ, Christ for the World." The program was built around the idea of enlisting youth, during the tender and pliable years, in Christian service.

Those on the program were Rev. Joseph Cooper, pastor City Temple, Sioux Falls, S. D.; Dr. Alonzo Petty, California; Dr. Earl V. Pierce, Minneapolis, Minn.; Rev. Lewis Jacobson, pastor First church, Sioux City, Ia.; Attorney Coe I. Crawford, South Dakota; G. Clifford Cress, field editor of THE BAPTIST; Dr. J. C. Richardson, Burma, and several of the pastors and workers of the state.

One delegate said, "Each address seems to be a little better than its predecessor." The addresses of the missionaries, including Miss Hattie Petheram of Burma, were filled with soul-stirring facts and figures. The delegates were inspired to do greater and better things than ever before for their God and his Christ.

The report of the board of managers, prepared and presented by the general superintendent, Dr. John L. Barton, declared that besides the eight missionaries on the state staff, the convention has made it possible for forty-one fields to have the ministry of pastors. During the first nine months of the year these men served 1109 weeks, preached 2167 sermons, made 6342 calls and baptized 148 candidates. Their churches contributed $5,246.06 for missions. The report also stated that our churches are rapidly getting the habit of making monthly payments and that the membership of the churches was increased almost 10 per cent by baptism.

A commission was appointed to make adequate plans for the golden anniversary of the South Dakota State Convention which will take place in five years. The plan is to adopt a suitable program with goals to be reached on or before the above-named date. The convention will aim to incorporate in the plan the meeting of the state convention in 1931 at Madison, S. D., the place of its organization forty-five years ago. This is a plan which will receive the hearty support of every South Dakota Baptist.

The president's address called the attention of the delegates to the duties and responsibilities of the members of the churches to kingdom advancement.

The convention went on record by a strong resolution against any effort on the part of the state tax commission, the state legislature or any person or persons, individually or collectively, to tax church and educational property.

Strong support and encouragement for Sioux Falls college was also declared. The college made a new departure this year in asking the state convention to nominate one-half of the candidates to fill the vacancies on the board of trustees of the college, said nominations, of course, to be considered in the regular way as to election.

It was the first full year on which John L. Barton reported as superintendent. His report showed that he is on the job and making good in his responsible position.

The spirit of evangelism was prevalent during the entire convention and was carried by the pastors and delegates back to their home fields. It is expected that this enthusiasm will make itself felt throughout the year.

The speakers mingled with the delegates between the sessions and dined with delegates, thus furthering acquaintance with them and making their addresses more effective. Another special commendation for the speakers was that they came to hear each other and appeared to receive as much benefit as those in the pews.

The convention elected for the ensuing year: President, Hon. J. M. Co. Sioux Falls; vice-presidents, E. H. B. of Brookings and C. S. Laugh Huron; clerk, Ansley B. Claypoole, Aberdeen; treasurer, E. A. Loomer, Mchell; historian, M. F. Martini, Sioux Falls.

Members of the board of managers are B. L. Carlton, Alcester; F. C. Fler, Madison; Joseph Swenson, Pierre; R. J. Lloyd, Hot Springs; A. W. Quet, Sioux Falls; Joseph Cooper, Sioux Falls. Representatives on the Federal Council of Churches are John L. Barton and A. Pierce Waltz. Representatives on the Anti-Saloon League include A. B. Claypoole and R. N. McCann; representatives on the Council of Religious Education, W. H. Bayles and E. Cloyd.

Nominees for trustees of Sioux Falls college are J. J. Allen, J. K. Cressey, H. Beatty, A. E. Godfrey, J. M. Gunn, A. B. Claypoole.

Boston Letter

By CHARLES H. WATSON
Many Happenings.

SOMETIMES events come on pell-mell and heap up, and one takes them by one off the pile and finds that the number compels brief mention if all included. This is such a time. Even high spots if fully noted would make too long a letter. Boston is wide awake. So are the churches in the regions round about as the unusual association meetings proved. Doubtless the brilliant October weather increased the attendance but the live and timely programs of report and discussion express something even more encouraging. The associations in and around Boston will average three churches apiece, embracing our largest bodies in their fellowship, attracting great assemblies and compelling programs as kindle and direct the vailing interest.

These meetings culminate in the state convention held this month in Dorchester, near Roselle's church, Malden. It is but a few miles from the heart of Boston, thus the meeting will surely fill the next "Boston Letter."

Ford Hall Forum.

We always look for the fall announcement of the forum meetings arranged and led by Dr. George W. Coleman, original forum man. They are certain to spring the unexpected as well as the expected. They handle only hot questions which always get hotter in handling. There is nothing conventional about the speakers. They are dug from every section where the social and political thermometer has mounted "blood-heat." And they have attracted Doctor Coleman because they beat things hard and say them strong. Some questions raised are: "Will Democracy Endure?", "Is Bolshevism in Retreat?", "Should the Philipinos have their Independence?", "What about the Theatre Today and Tomorrow?" Imagine questions handled without gloves, evoking an hour's pelting quiz after ecture! Something happens at Ford all Sunday evenings.

Sherwood Eddy.

Doctor Eddy has been spending more than a week in Boston and vicinity, filling the days and nights with earnest and rousing addresses. He was the noon-day preacher at Kings chapel last week. The large congregations attested that a ve minister was discovered.

At the ministers' united meeting he gave an impression of present-day Russia that will stay. His fairness to the contending parties, even to the million communists who have been ruling the more than a hundred and forty millions with a rod of iron, was absolute. Not a good thing escaped him, or a bad one. Even the far-reaching plans of the million communists now wielding the power will not awaken the more than hundred millions of peasants and finally bring on the formidable and overwhelming judgment of the present tyrannical officials. Doctor Eddy made the occasion tense and vital. He knows how to travel, how to inspire and how to be a Christian sociologist on a world scale.

Important Events in the City.

The laying of the corner-stone of the new parish house of Dudley Street church, was a memorable event, and coming on Sunday afternoon attracted a large company. When you recall the strategic location of the noble old church standing where all the arteries of traffic converge, backed with its historic past, stimulated by its thrilling present under Pastor Brooks, and put a $200,000 church workshop with all the convenient modern equipment alongside the fine Gothic sanctuary you get the significance of the ceremony on Sunday. A vigorous church, a live minister, a well-endowed Boston Baptist Social Union and the beneficence of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., together make this noble achievement possible.

What was the wise thing to do at Ruger's Street has been a question since fire over a year ago. Finally it was decided neither to rebuild nor to move to buy a neighboring church and add there the old field and the "fort." Out of the ample fund left by Daniel Ford for work on that field, the social union has bought the Swedish congregational meeting house close by the old church, and there will continue Christian service among the laboring people that Mr. Ford loved and made provisions for. There will be abundant funds to improve the property and vigorously push the work under the new plan when he is found. This seems a happy solution of a difficult problem.

The Boston Baptist Workers' Union held its October meeting with an attendance of 223. This is not a mass meeting, but a students' and workers' union, drawn from the whole region. Every one present as a student seeking for a more diligent and consecrated service.

First Dorchester.

Pastor Robert Lee Webb has been inspiring his people in a rousing celebration of the ninetieth anniversary of the planting of First church, Dorchester. Coming after Doctor Webb's most prosperous year there, the feast was jubilant with a well-balanced program. The mayor of the city was represented. Speakers were Dr. A. A. Forshee; Hon. L. J. Fosdick; Rev. John B. Wilson; Rev. A. Barnard Webber; Rev. Miles W. Smith. Few of us realized that "old First" was the banyan tree from whose branches the roots of much stronger churches in the district have grown.

First Church, Salem.

Rev. Ralph A. Sherwood has also had the best of his nine years in the pastorate of the historic First church at Salem. That has long been a solid and admirably situated sanctuary and has enjoyed a succession of strong ministers and laymen. After extensive redecoration, and rebuilding of the organ, the church held a large community vesper service Oct. 10. Rev. Walter E. Woodbury of Melrose preached the sermon. In the morning the pastor preached, and the members of the large church family rejoiced together in the beautified sanctuary and the glad fellowship they were sharing. The warm response of the people to Pastor Sherwood's leadership is giving the old church experiences as rich as any in its history.

Two Social Union Meetings.

October brings the opening meeting of the season which is always a happy reunion after the long vacation period and draws a full house. President Easton brought as speaker his former pastor at Tremont Temple, Dr. Cortland Myers, who received a cordial greeting and a hearty response to an address on "The Holy Spirit."

The November meeting comes on the first and is the annual "Ladies Night." The social feature being more pronounced, the spread and the music exceeding the ordinary, the attendance nearly doubled, the speaker always one of acceptability, the occasion takes on an air of peculiar festivity, and is much anticipated. This year Dr. John Snape of Cleveland is the speaker, doubtless selected in part because of his popularity as a summer preacher at Tremont Temple. Doctor Snape combines many high qualities in platform mastery, and is easily persuasive.

A Young Man at Somerville.

He is at First church, the slightly landmark on Spring Hill. In the more than two years of his service there he has lifted every part of the work into prosperity. It is one more instance where a capable leader brings to pass all that a church can wish and more than it dare expect. Financially it has "cleaned house", improved the church property, populated the prayer meeting, built a men's class into a roster of 300, expanded the Bible school, and generated and distributed good cheer. The young pastor is W. T. Murphy, Jr., a real leader.

Mid-October Days.

Uncommonly welcome has been the autumnal picture around Boston and suburbs and we regretfully part with it. All the joyousness of spring and the glory of the summer seem to flame in the October salutation. Perhaps we best retain it as we seek the diviner beauties to which the wide open doors of our churches beckon us. "Nothing stabilizes joy like faith."

North Dakota Convention

BY FRED E. STOCKTON

A WONDERFUL convention. These words accurately describe the meeting of North Dakota Baptists held at Minot, Oct. 6-10. The spirit of the convention was wonderful in its unity, harmony and optimism, with no word of criticism or pessimism. The messages brought by the speakers were inspiring and informing. The hospitality was generous and truly western. The weather was ideal. Controversy was absent. At no point was there theological discussion; instead, there was theological demonstration from start to finish.

Sunday morning when delegates came down to breakfast at the home of one of the friends of the church, their host remarked, "Have you noticed that I have put the flag up?" When his guests inquired why, he answered, "It has been so pleasant to have you in our home and there has been such peace and harmony in the convention that I thought I would put the flag up this morning." And Old Glory floated to the breeze in Minot, not as a symbol of war but as a tribute to peace and good-will.

At the business sessions of the convention and the state board all actions were hearty and unanimous. Mr. J. N. Jenson of Fargo was elected convention president; Rev. W. E. Pool of Minot president of the ministers' conference; Mrs. F. E. Stockton of Fargo president of the North Dakota woman's mission society. The council called to examine Pastor O. H. Hallgrimson of Ellendale voted unanimously for his ordination which will be held with the Ellendale church Nov. 1.

The convention was peculiarly favored this year in its out-of-state speakers. Dr. Frank A. Smith, secretary of missions of the Home Mission Society was present for one day and delivered two helpful addresses. Rev. J. C. Richardson of Burma attended one day. Miss Mabelle Rae McVeigh, foreign and candidate secretary of the Woman's Baptist Foreign Mission Society, delivered several addresses. Dr. York A. King of Chicago spent one day at Minot and delivered two addresses. Dr. M. P. Boynton of Chicago was the special convention preacher, delivering an address each evening. He spoke on such subjects as "The Will to Stay," "The Majesty of the Ministry," "The Church Organized for Work" and "The Sort of Church Members Jesus Wants." Doctor Boynton preached an evangelistic sermon Sunday evening, and at the close of the service a large number of people went forward to accept Christ as their personal Saviour. During the testimony meeting a young man told how he had traveled with a group of young people 100 miles to attend the service and three of the party were among those who had just confessed Christ.

The Minot convention was a "singing convention." The song services each evening were in charge of Evangelist and Mrs. E. G. Aldridge. One evening several songs were sung in the Norwegian language and another evening a Swedish choir and string band furnished the music. Sunday afternoon a choir of Russian young people sang several Russian hymns and anthems. The Minot church choir contributed several selections during the convention. The harmony of the music found a fitting response in the harmony of the spirit of the convention.

A feature of the convention was the banquet given to Rev. C. J. Hill who is retiring from the work as convention missionary at seventy years of age. Mr. Hill has given over thirty years to the work of the denomination. The board voted to give him the month of November on full salary for his vacation. Mr. Hill will spend part of the month hunting deer in the woods of northern Minnesota.

The report of Fred E. Stockton, general superintendent, showed that the number of baptisms during the year exceeded that of any of the past six years. The increase over the report of last year is over 100 per cent.

The convention enters heartily with the denomination upon the evangelistic program for the present year.

The invitation of the First church of Bismark was accepted for the meeting of the convention in 1927.

Connecticut Anniversaries

By HORACE B. SLOAT

THE Connecticut Baptist anniversaries were held with the Union church, Mystic, Oct. 11-13.

A special session was called at eleven a. m. Monday, at which Rev. W. N. Donovan of Newton Theological institution delivered a thoughtful address on "The Morals of the Law and Wisdom." The forty-fifth annual conference of the Baptist ministers of Connecticut met at two p. m., Rev. George R. Atha, Groton, presiding. After the usual routine business Professor Donovan again addressed the ministers, taking for his subject "The Morals of the Seers and Singers," after which Rev. John B. Pharr, New Haven, read an essay on "The Lost Chord in Preaching." While the ministers were in session an informal reception was given to the ministers' wives and widows at the home of Mrs. L. P. Allyn, Mystic, with Mrs. L. J. Shepler as assistant hostess. Mrs. D. A. Pitt of Norwich had charge of the program.

The young people's banquet was held at six-fifteen. The program was furnished by the young people themselves. Following the young people's "get together" there was a joint meeting of the Connecticut Baptist Education Society and the Baptist young people of Connecticut in the main auditorium of the church at eight fifteen. Two addresses constituted the program of the evening, one by Rev. Milton G. Evans, president of Crozer seminary, on "Youth—the Wealth of the Church," the other by Miss Edna Umstot, Chicago, life work secretary of the B. Y. P. U. of A., on "A World Tour."

Tuesday dawned fair and Baptists came from all parts of the state to meet in the 103rd annual gathering of the Connecticut Baptist Convention which opened at nine forty-five a. m. Rev. L. J. Shepler cordially welcomed the delegates, after which Rev. David A. Pitt, president of the convention, responded and delivered his annual message. Reports of the board of managers, of the committee of missionary cooperation, of the committee on religious education and the finance committee were made by the secretaries, E. E. Gates, H. B. Sloat, O. P. Campbell, and Chairman H. H. Dickinson, respectively. Charles Edward Prior, treasurer of the convention, then presented his report. Rev. R. W. Ferguson of Rockville preached the annual sermon, taking for his text John 20:21. The second session opened at two p. m. with a packed house and a growing interest on the part of all. Miss Margaret Suman, of the Philippine Islands, vividly described her work in that far-away field. At this point in the program an innovation was introduced in the form of a forum on field, force and finances. Secy. E. E. Gates introduced thirty workers who are engaged within the state. This feature was followed by two addresses, the first by Rev. I. H. Benedict, Hartford, on "Shall We Aid the Church at X?"; the second by Mrs. J. E. Parrella, wife of the Italian pastor, New Haven, on "New Americans—Our Responsibility." A carefully prepared questionnaire covering all vital matters having to do with our task as Baptists was distributed throughout the audience. Dr. W. H. Bowler proved the "man of the hour" with his ready answers to the various questions having to do with the larger aspects of our denominational activities. This proved an interesting and informing half hour. Rev. William A. Reid, general secretary of the Rhode Island Convention, delivered an address on "The Task of a State Convention," emphasizing the fact that state conventions should give especial attention to rural and suburban needs, as well as increased attention to the work among the foreign-speaking.

The women held their annual banquet at five thirty p. m., serving a second table at six thirty, after which they adjourned to the auditorium of the church where a public session was held at seven forty-five. Mrs. A. M. Brown, Mrs. J.

If you must judge us, then judge us by what we strive for. If we are weak, be tolerant; if we are strong, pray that we become not arrogant; if our mistakes injure you, tell us of them, and trust in our sense of justice to make reparation. If we cannot agree on details, such as politics and religion, let us agree on the broad, fundamental principles of human kindness, for when we put aside the accumulation of opinions that are the children of self-interest, we shall find a family resemblance in the faces of all men.

—Satinettes.

R. Holley and Mrs. G. C. Lauden conducted a symposium on women's work. Mrs. Adah H. Boyce, general missionary of the central division of the W. B. H. M. S. gave an address on the general work of that society. She was followed by Dr. W. H. Bowler of New York. The session closed with the pleasant, "Our Inheritance," under the direction of the author, Mrs. C. H. Barrett, Hartford.

At seven p. m. the laymen held the banquet in the Hotel Mystic. The speakers were Dr. W. H. Bowler and Captain J. F. Laughton.

The Wednesday morning session was divided between routine affairs and platform addresses. Speakers were Miss Mary L. Howard, president of the state woman's mission society, J. F. Laughton, captain of the gospel ship, Inland sea, Japan, and Dr. W. H. Bowler, executive secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation. Two addresses, one "The Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board" by Rev. E. T. Tomlinson, New York, and the other on "Law Enforcement" by Rev. Ellis Gilbert, West Hartford, took the major part of the afternoon session. These were followed by the report of the evangelistic committee by Rev. P. F. Wolfenden, Bristol, after which Dr. David A. Pitt conducted a conference on evangelism. The closing address of the convention was delivered by Rev. Harold B. Camp, pastor of the Calvary church, New Haven on "What Are Churches For?"

The devotional periods of the anniversaries were conducted by Rev. E. Weise, Noank; Rev. C. H. Heimsa, Bridgeport; Rev. John W. Brush, New Haven; Rev. E. C. Dunbar, Norwich; Rev. J. C. Hendrickson, Stamford; Rev. F. P. Freeman, Ansonia. The motto of the convention was the same as that of the national convention, "Victory through Our Lord Jesus Christ." The attendance was unusually large, the program markedly strong and the atmosphere of high spiritual tone. The general comment was, "the finest convention yet."

Officers elected for the ensuing year for the Baptist ministers conference were: president, E. C. Bunbar, Norwich; secretary, E. E. Scates, Jewett City; for the ministers' wives' association, president, Mrs. I. H. Benedict, Hartford; secretary, Mrs. L. T. Mallery, S. Norwalk; chairman program committee, Mrs. Ellis Gilbert, West Hartford; for the laymen's council, president, A. L. Muller, Waterbury; vice-president, James Case, Norwich; secretary, Horace Sloat, Hartford; for the education society, president, Rev. B. N. Timmerman, Meriden; vice-president, Rev. H. Thompson, Stonington; vice-president, Rev. J. G. Osborne, Danbury; secretary, Rev. E. E. Sundt, S. Willington; treasurer, Chapel S. Carter, Ansonia; auditor, Mr. J. Buckley, Ansonia; for the convention, Rev. David A. Pitt, Norwich; first vice-president, H. H. Dickinson, Hartford; second vice-president, Mrs. Allen W. Brown, West Hartford; general secretary, Rev. "Now what do you think of this? A man says he sent $2.50 to a concern which diverted an appliance for keeping down gas bills. He says when the thing arrived was only a ten-cent paperweight. Can you beat it? The same amount of money invested in his denominational paper might not have kept down his gas bill (in fact, seems to work the other way with some people), but at least he would have had copies of the—

"Honestly, we're not joshing. It doesn't work after the fashion of a certain restaurant. The guest inquired of the waiter, 'This is a good restaurant, isn't it?' 'Yes,' replied George, 'If you order a fresh egg you will get the freshest egg in the world. If you order a good cup of coffee you will get the best cup of coffee in the world, and—' 'I believe it!' shouted the irate guest, 'I ordered a small steak and—' 'No, no, nothing like that. $2.50 invested in THE BAPTIST brings the world to your door. What more do you want? We aim to give good measure, heaped and pressed down, shaken together and running over.

"Yes, surely. We've been criticised a little. It reminds us of the family that just returned from the morning service. Dad said the sermon was on the son; mother was sure the music was punk; sister thought the ushers were awfully plain. Then Tommy, who had observed what his relatives had put on the collection plate, piped up and said, 'Well, I thought the whole show wasn't so worse for a sickle apiece.' Those who are loudest in their criticisms are usually those who have never tried to help the editors improve the paper. Just get this:

"Enclosed find $2.50 for renewal, and in addition will add that I appreciate THE BAPTIST more each year.' So writes Mrs. C. A. Davis of Rochester, N. H. It is a little phrase, 'And in addition,' that makes all the difference in the world. Mrs. Davis didn't have to do that. It just came out of her heart and it lightened the load for us. It is such a contrast to those who are always singing the well-known song: 'Fight in the corner where you are.'

"We asked a pastor the other day if he wouldn't make a special effort to enlist more people as readers of the paper. 'Ah, brother,' sadly quoth he, 'I have my nose to the grindstone too long and too hard now.' We saw our quest was hopeless. Reminded us of the rube who drove his old tin can down Michigan avenue. He attempted to turn into Jackson boulevard. 'Kin I turn here?' he yelled to a policeman. 'I think maybe you can,' said the officer politely, 'If you've got a steering wheel.' That was the rub. Our depressed pastor with his nasal protuberance against the grindstone lacked a steering wheel. He was not running the machine. It was running him. This is tragedy triumphant. Everybody suffers along with the flat-nosed proboscis.

"Pep up," says Pastor Ray McCann of Mitchell, S. D. 'THE BAPTIST is getting better and better. The section on "Churches at Work" is especially helpful. I'm trying out an experiment. I get three copies of the paper every week and place them on a table in the rear of the church and they sell themselves. I am planning on putting on a series of four-minute speeches in the morning services during articles in the paper. I am also arranging to get the $2 rate by increasing our list to 10 per cent of our membership. A non-reading pew makes the work of the pulpit just about twice as hard. Why this extra hard sledding?' Pastor McCann has the right idea. No war was ever won by General Apathy. A non-reading church is nearly always an apathetic church.

"The office boy says that in his opinion all church members may be divided in the following groups: workers, jerkers and shirkers. The workers are a'ways at it. The workers read THE BAPTIST and pay for it cheerfully. The jerkers move by hand and starts. They are busy by streaks but you never can tell whether they are coming or going. The shirkers are the perpetually tired people who never do anything but rest. For them a suitable collect is 'From such, Good Lord, deliver us, O Lord.'

"WCOY now signs off. Sweet dreams if your sub. is in advance. If otherwise, how could they be? Good night."

Adults except eight, and thirty-eight were baptized. An orchestra has been organized for the Sunday school. Sunday-school attendance has reached 100. Church attendance has more than doubled in recent months.

On the eve of the election, the political tangle in Illinois among the candidates for United States senator is significant. The democratic candidate, Mr. George Brennan, is uncompromisingly "wet." Mr. Frank L. Smith, the choice of the republican party is politically and, his friends say, personally "dry." Mr. Hugh S. Magill, running independently, is unquestionably "bone dry." The Anti-Saloon League has endorsed Smith. A revolt against Smith developed several weeks ago due to the fact that Smith's campaign has been financed heavily by great corporate interests. Magill is in the race as a practical protest against alleged corruption in politics represented by both Smith and Brennan. The Anti-Saloon League steadily refusing to withdraw its endorsement of Smith is the target for the indignant criticism of many former friends and supporters of the league. In the meantime the world's greatest newspaper and the Hearst papers are supporting Brennan on his "wet" platform and Magill on his "dry" platform. It is a triangular tangle which only the voters can straighten out on election day. The game of politics is a difficult game for an idealist to learn and to play with skill and the game is on in Illinois with a vengeance.

Editor and Mrs. John Earl were the first guests to enjoy the hospitality of President and Mrs. W. P. McKee in their new home on the beautiful campus of Frances Shimer school when the editor conducted the vesper services in the college chapel Oct. 17. The president's house is the gift of Mrs. Winona Branch Sawyer, Lincoln, Neb., and is named in her honor, the Winona Branch Sawyer house. Mrs. Sawyer was graduated in 1873 from the Mt. Carroll seminary which was founded in 1853 by Frances Shimer. The memorial which her gift has made possible is all that a college president's house should be. As the school will appear in the near future in THE BAPTIST in a feature article written by H. Campbell-Duncan the description of the house will be deferred until then. In the meantime we are giving our readers the opportunity of looking on the fine face of the woman to whom Frances Shimer school is indebted for the new home of the president.

enforcement budget for the year starting July 1, 1927, at thirty million dollars.

"Enforcement would be worth a billion dollars as an economic investment," says Irving Fisher, professor of economics at Yale university.

Thirty million dollars placed against one billion dollars does not loom large. And this concerns only the economic effect. The social, industrial and moral benefits are not included.

Ninth cover: It is stated that the eighteenth amendment should be peeled out of consideration for the boring men, upon whom it is said to work hardship. We quote from an editorial headed "Prosperity Will Last" which appeared recently in Collier's Weekly: "Business is good beyond expectation and prosperity gives every promise of long continuance. . . . The biggest single factor in our continuing prosperity is the upward tendency of wages. . . . Prohibition is another undoubted cause of our unprecedented prosperity."

"We find that the 'real' wages of employed workers in American industry after making all due allowance for changes in the purchasing power of the dollar, increased 22 per cent between 1914 and 1925; also that most of the sudden improvement came immediately after prohibition," writes Irving Fisher in "Prohibition at Its Worst."

Louis J. Taber of Ohio, master of the national grange, is reported to have told President Coolidge that the farmer is stronger for law enforcement now than ever before. To newspaper men according to one of them in the Chicago Daily News he stated that he had returned from a recent trip to Europe a lot drier than he went over. The low wages, low standard of living and long working hours in Europe had convinced him, he asserted, that America must stay dry.

John G. Shedd, chairman of the board of Marshall Field and Co., is quoted in the Economist as saying: "The benefits from prohibition which have occurred to working men and their families in the last seven years cannot be stressed too strongly. . . . Savings have been growing steadily from year to year, and the growth in the accumulations of the labor classes has been notable since prohibition closed the corner saloon."

Whiting Williams, who left an executive position to work in the ranks of labor in many sections, that he might be qualified to write "What's on the Worker's Mind?" says from his wide experience: "As to the great mass of self-respecting workers, these, I say, know well already, the peril of John Barleycorn as a social companion. They are feeling daily less and less need of ministrations because they are not only enjoying better homes, better wages, better recognition generally, but because they are finding so much more satisfaction in what these new betterments permit—the movies, the radio, the respectable dance hall and, of course, the club. Hardly one of this great group would vote either for the old saloon again or for whiskey."

Tenth cover: One method often

MRS. WINONA BRANCH SAWYER

Recently recommended to us for holding liquor traffic in check should it be stored, is that of government control of the manufacture and sale of liquor, such as is practiced in some of the provinces of Canada. Recently one of the well-known publications of this country sent a staff correspondent to Canada to investigate and report conditions resulting from this government control. To quote from one section of the published report:

"British Columbia" decided some five years ago to adopt 'moderation' with government control of liquor. Today it finds itself with something approaching liquor control of government. . . . Everywhere in British Columbia today is the public conviction that liquor plays too prominent a part in public affairs; that the politics of the province is hopelessly entangled with the liquor interests; and that the province's efforts are being devoted not to temperance, but to the sale of liquor in ever increasing quantities."

A. M. Manson, the attorney general in charge of the liquor business in the province, is quoted as saying: "There never has been a day when the brewers have spent every minute of it doing their utmost to contravene the will of the people, to defy the government of the province and to tear down the law of the land."

The "Vancouver Province" is quoted: "The situation is disturbing, for the uneasy alliance of liquor and politics never looked anything but evil for British Columbia."

In the light of such an experience are we in the United States prepared to advocate the restoration of the liquor traffic even under government control?

Eleventh cover: Much is said and written of the dangers from the bad liquor dispensed by the bootlegger. The claim is made that if the liquor business is restored and regulated by law, bootlegging will be discontinued, the drinker can be sure of the "pure article" and will not run the risk of being poisoned by the bootlegger's product. Bootlegging is not a by-product of prohibition, but its evils, including poison moonshine, unknown in pre-prohibition days.

When the American saloon was in vogue under license, there existed in every town and village and big city a professional bootlegger and joint-ventures states the Christian Herald. Would it seem to justify the belief or the argument that repeal of the eighteenth amendment and restoration of the liquor traffic would abolish bootlegging?

Twelfth cover: The statement is repeatedly made that the eighteenth amendment is corrupting the youth of the country; that since it was adopted drinking has very largely increased in our colleges. However, a poll of 213 college institutions in forty-four states conducted by the Literary Digest has disclosed that drinking in our colleges is decreasing.

"Prohibition is winning in the colleges, according to the almost unanimous testimony of more than 200 college and university heads who have replied to a questionnaire. . . . The repeated charges that college students and the youth of the land at large have been debauched by prohibition are refuted by this great array of witnesses."

Frederick S. Jones, outgoing dean of Yale college, reports that "there is decidedly less drinking than before prohibition."

Pres. Daniel L. Marsh of Boston university says: "The fact of the matter is that there is no comparison between conditions today and conditions as they were before prohibition. . . . It happens that I am now president of the university where I was a student eighteen or nineteen years ago. I speak the words of conservative truth when I say there is by no means as much drinking today in the city of Boston or among the students of this student center as there was a score of years ago."

"The majority of these young editors agree with the majority opinion expressed by the college heads . . . that drinking among students has declined in recent years."

"The proportion of drinkers has certainly decreased."

"Drinking has greatly decreased."

"There is less drinking than before prohibition."

"Drinking has decreased remarkably during the last six years."

"The majority of students, male and co-eds, are against drinking."

"Prohibition has been a success."

"It is significant that the majority of replies from New York state, where enforcement is said to be an uphill battle all the way, express the opinion that drinking is on the decrease."

Such are the truths revealed when some of the covers are lifted. There are other covers which might be lifted, revealing other truths.

We have not attempted here to list all of the benefits which have resulted from prohibition. Nor have we endeavored to refute every ingenious argument put forth by those who are deliberately and determinedly attempting to bring back into our country the licensed drink menace. We have merely presented some of the facts.

The temptation to remain silent when statements are made in our presence attacking the eighteenth amendment and undermining the cause of prohibition is a natural one. We shrink from debate or discussion. We are desirous of peaceful relations. Let us not overlook the fact, however, that our silence is construed as approval and agreement. It becomes, then, a form of actual treachery to the truth and to our convictions. It is time for us to speak on this subject fearlessly, authoritatively, and at every opportunity. We have no need to apologize for being advocates of a righteous cause. A movement which is directed against the foundations of our government, which threatens to destroy the happiness of our homes, which would help to degrade and debauch our citizens and to pollute the atmosphere breathed by our children, cannot but challenge Christian womanhood to determined resistance.

What shall we do about it?

Let us not minimize or disregard our personal responsibility.

Two Questions and One Answer

THE QUESTIONS

1. How can I safeguard my bequests for benevolent causes?
A will is fraught with legal technicalities involving the possibility of contest and waste of money in execution.
2. How can I leave an assured income for my heirs?
It is estimated that, in two cases out of every three, estates are entirely consumed at the end of seven years.

THE ANSWER

You can solve both problems by making yourself your own executor as provided in the annuity plan. Our new booklet explains the annuity plan fully. We shall be glad to send it to you on request. Let us speak frankly and with conviction to our friends and associates at club, at church, in social gatherings and in our homes, of the facts appearing here or gathered elsewhere. They need to know some of these things. They need to know that we believe in prohibition.

Let us not fail to vote at all elections.

Let us vote only for candidates of character, who declare themselves in favor of law enforcement and who are active supporters of the eighteenth amendment.

Let us use our influence to induce others to vote.

Let us not underestimate the accomplishing power of a strong righteous conviction.

Let us pray that all Christian people may be true to the responsibility which rests upon them.

Lesson Notes for Nov. 7

THE FALL OF JERICHO
Lesson Text: Josh. 6:12-20. Golden Text: I. John 5:4

Some things fall down without the application of force from the outside. They carry within themselves the seeds of their own dissolution. Such was the case with ancient Jericho.

The Foolishness of God

It is Paul who uses the phrase, "the foolishness of God," with reference to the preaching of the cross which to the Greeks was folly and to the Jews a stumbling-block. But Paul proceeds to add that the foolishness of God is wiser than man. The fall of the walls of Jericho is a striking illustration of the same truth. It must have been a strange sight to the citizens of the fortified city of Jericho to watch a peaceful parade of religious enthusiasts proceeding around the walls once a day for six consecutive days and seven times around the wall on the seventh day. It must have looked like a peace of organized absurdity. The parade was timed to the minute with the march of the years, and when the hour of destiny struck, the walls of Jericho fell because disintegration sapped their strength, and destruction was inevitable. To all appearance the walls may have looked as formidable as ever, and it must have required faith of a courageous kind to compel the marchers to walk around the city in the belief that the procession itself would eventuate in the fall of Jericho. For like that is always the inspiration of progress. Slavery was entrenched in America for generations, and when abolitionists began their organized efforts to make the United States the land of the free in reality, they were regarded by the vested interests with as much cynicism as the Israelites were regarded by the overconfident people of Jericho. But the long and apparently fruitless march of events with abolitionist defeat more numerous than victories, produced a Lincoln who signed the declaration of emancipation. Hardly anybody dreamed twenty-five years ago that the liquor traffic would be outlawed in America the first quarter of the twentieth century. It was a discouraging round of political defeats that met the old prohibition party year after year as its candidates were placed on the ballots; prohibitionists kept on marching. The liquor traffic laughed at the feeble efforts of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union with its slow-moving educational program and with its members helpless in politics because they were denied the ballot. But the W. T. U. never allowed the parade to stop until women were enfranchised and the walls of the protected liquor traffic came down. The movement against war, the organized efforts for international good-will and permanent peace are regarded today in many quarters as absurd. But wars will cease because they will be outlawed, and the march of progress will go on unbroken because we have faith in the ultimate victory of right against might, and because of faith they will carry on a fight for which seems to be less than a forlorn hope.

good lesson to every pastor; but whatever he adopts of the prayer meeting plan he had better leave untouched the notion of advertising the nostrums of Paine and Ingersoll. A Clausen might make the scheme profitable, but not the average good preacher in even a good church. In summing up the merits of Doctor Clausen's "technique" we are obsessed with the conclusion that it is the "man behind the gun" that does the execution.

Mary the Mother and All Mothers, by George MacAdams. New York: Abingdon Press. $1.50.

A book that will be welcomed especially by those who desire more religion and less "handkerchief display" on Mother's day. Here is beauty without sentimentality, and reverence without superstition.

—FRED E. DEAN.

American Villagers, by C. Luther Fry of the Institute of Social and Religious Research. New York: Doran. $2.50.

The present condition of the rural population presents one of the greatest problems in American life. An American village is defined as one having a population of 250-2500 people. Doctor Fry tells us that there are 18,000 American villages comprising one-eighth of the population of the United States. He tabulates the population of these villages as to race, sex, profession, the percentage married and the number of children in each family. He also gives school and church statistics. There is an introduction by Dr. Esmund des Brunner, sociologist, and a chapter on the social composition of the United States by Luther Sheeliegh Cressman. To those interested in rural life, the book should prove valuable.

The Saving Sense

Jimmy, spending the night with George, tumbled into bed without saying his prayers, while George knelt and said his prayers earnestly.

"I don't ever say any prayers at home," boasted Jimmy.

"Well, you better say them here because this is a folding bed," said George.

She: "What animal would you say is the most stupid, Thomas?"

He: "The sheep, my lamb."

He had called to take his girl friend to church and was enthusing about the new minister.

"Why, he moves every one to tears! You should have been there this morning—there wasn't a dry eye in the house."

"I can't go then," said the girl friend, taking off her hat. "I've got the wrong kind of make-up on."

"There's more than one road leading to heaven," said Bishop Manning, in depreciation of religious differences. "Most of these religious quarrels remind me of little Egbert Jones.

"Egbert," said his teacher, 'how much is six and four?'

"Twelve," said little Egbert.

"No. Try again."

"Nineteen."

"No."

"Seventy-seven."

"Egbert, Egbert," said the teacher, 'why not guess, while you're about a smaller number—ten, for instance?'

"Oh, no," said little Egbert; 'six and four couldn't be ten.'

"Why couldn't it?" cried the teacher.

"Because," said Egbert triumphantly, 'five and five are ten.'

Seams of Glory

By Philip Wendell Crannell, D. D.

A series of thirty-four practical little essays, prompted by many and varied contacts of the author in the school-room and pulpit, and through the press. The purpose is to furnish a medicine-chest of spiritual tonics to those who are fashioning the fabrics of the soul, their own or others'. Pastors will find the book suggestively helpful in their ministry. But it is quite as much a volume for the average reader.

Folks, Facts and Opinion

This topsy-turvy society of ours has been sending its women into the office; will it end by putting its men into the kitchen? Men of Providence, R. I., at least some of them, are making arrangements to take cooking lessons.

For several years the W. C. T. U. has been thrown to some degree into the shade by the leadership of the Anti-Saloon League. But it has never ceased to enlist a considerable body of earnest women in its broad program of reform. Recently it has entered upon a new phase of activity and prominence, and in the last eleven months it has enrolled 55,000 new members.

Once more the "Nordic myth" has been exploded, this time by Dr. Nathaniel M. Hirsch. He tested more than 5000 New England school children and found their intelligence to run in the following order from the highest down: Polish Jews, Swedes, English, Russian Jews, Germans, Americans, Lithuanians, Irish, British Canadians, Russians, Poles, Greeks, Italians, French Canadians, negroes and Portuguese. This proves what it proves, if anything.

Sherwood Eddy looks forward to a new religious reformation as vital and far-reaching as that of Luther's day. He finds the Protestant reformation in a state of arrested development, that it gave to the world an individualism that does not fit the social needs of this age, that our inheritance through it is a patchwork of Greek, Roman, Teuton, Lutheran and Calvinist elements in a semi-pagan civilization. In the Central Christian Advocate he sketches a needed and coming reformation that "will be true to the spirit and genius of the age; will combine vital personal religion with social application; and will have the dynamic of spiritual passion."

"Thou shalt not upset the apple cart" is a new commandment discovered by the editors of the Methodist church papers. And they reject it with gusto. It grows out of a situation described by them in these words: "Like the pressure of the atmosphere of fifteen pounds to the square inch on all of us, there is the ever-present pressure of the ruling ideas of the masters of the economic and business world and the situation of the church itself. That situation is complicated in thousands of instances by the fact that the church has given large hostages to the business world to further a building program. Millions of dollars of mortgages are held over churches. There are unpaid pledges of other millions of dollars. It is for the temporal interest of the church to avoid any disturbance in the placid calm of business prosperity."

It is reported that the Soviet government is promoting the establishment of a Jewish land colony of 100,000 people on the coast of the Azov sea.

The use of passenger airplanes with sleeping accommodations has begun in Europe. And a hydroplane is about to be launched at Friedrichshaven, Germany, that will carry twenty-five people.

We have this interesting information from Pres. V. L. Duke concerning the Zanja, which is pictured on our cover page: The Zanja is a small stream which flows through the University of Redlands campus. Tradition says that it is an artificial stream built by the Indians in the very early years. The water which flows through this stream comes from the mountains just east of Redlands, the highest peak of which is Mt. San Geronio, commonly known as Old Gray Back. It has an elevation of something over 11,000 feet and is the highest peak in Southern California.

In Nineteen Seventeen

BY RALPH M. JONES

*I CAME upon the name an hour ago
Of Silas Drew, just half-way down the list
Of soldiers killed in action. Well, I know
That he'll be missed.*

*He was so commonplace, and prone to thrive
On little-village life, it doesn't seem He could be dead that way. He used to drive
Peck's order team.*

*And even now his eyes look into mine,
The order-book poised deftly on his palm:
"Well, what's today? Our grapes are extra-fine—
I thank you ma'am."*

*The little church will miss his freckled face
Beside the shrill soprano's; and the queer
Abrupt explosions of his cautious bass
Still haunt my ear.*

*And now he's dead in France, like some old knight
Who fought with paynims in the long ago
For his fair lady. And it seemeth right
To have it so.*

*Ah, dear Democracy, how many brave
And strong and wise, who left a shining name
In storied verse, have gone into the grave
For your true fame!*

*But yet to me there lies some special gleam
Of finer grace in this: that Silas Drew Should clamber down from his old order team
To die for you.*

An Armistice day message of the Federal Council of Churches presents this alternative: "Either the creation of effective agencies for the settlement of every dispute by the arbitrament of reason, law and conciliation, with general agreements to use those agencies and solemn undertakings not to resort to war; or ever-increasing competitive preparation for war and recurring wars."

Five hundred Jewish rabbis are reported to be under investigation on the charge of having diverted sacramental wine to secular uses, that is, having used it or sold it for beverage purposes. The American Israelite expresses the hope that any such practice may be stopped. It says that no Jewish law requires the use of wine with alcoholic content in religious services, but that unfermented grape juice is just as allowable.

Rev. F. J. Peters, who for four years has served as general evangelist in Cuba, Porto Rico and Central America, has recently accepted a call to be American secretary for the South American Evangelical Union. This is an undenominational English mission which has heretofore maintained a branch office in Canada. It carries on missionary operations in Argentine and Peru where it is the successor of the Regions Beyond mission founded by Dr. H. Grattan Guinness. Mr. Peters rendered valuable service to the Home Mission Society by his special capacity as evangelist, but the field and opportunities for these intensive campaigns being limited, it was not possible to continue him in this service every year. It is hoped that after a period of service in this country the work may be opened again for Mr. Peters to give himself to special evangelistic service under denominational auspices.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature, Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill., is rendering a significant and valuable service to the churches in the publication of a Bible series of popular religion leaflets. "The Sermon on the Mount" from the translation by Edgar J. Goodspeed with a historical introduction by Ernest F. Scott is the latest of the series. Professor Scott calls the sermon on the Mount the fundamental document of the Christian religion. And it is fundamental because its message deals with the spirit rather than the forms of religion and reaches down deep beneath the surface of things to the hidden motives of the heart. The translation by Goodspeed in modern newspaper English which the man on the street can read with interest and understand. The American Institute of Sacred Literature conducts non-study courses in the Bible and religion and 10,000 register for its courses every year.

A gigantic program for the development of the resources of the great West is taking definite form. At an all-western conference held in Los Angeles in October a "winning of the West" league was formed. It will undertake to bring to service under one comprehensive plan the vast power resources of the Rocky mountains and of the region westward to the coast.

Back to the custom of the fathers seems to be the tendency of education with reference to the community use of school buildings. In many localities such buildings are used by local groups of citizens for recreation, discussion and research under various restrictions. Discrimination against unpopular minorities is to be expected in granting the use of the buildings, but even so their use for community service will make a valuable contribution to the community life.

The Chamber of Horrors is suggested in the Living Church as the appropriate repository for the following account of the worship of God as described in the Kansas Gazette: "At the Majestic theater at nine-thirty a. m. tomorrow the Harry G. Knowles Bible class will observe its second annual Ford Sunday. All Ford dealers will be special guests. Main street, from Seventh to Ninth, will be reserved as parking space for Fords only. Three-pound box of chocolates will be given to the man driving the oldest Ford in the class, and a two-pound box of chocolates will be given to the man who owns the largest number of men to the class in his Ford. Mr. Knowles will teach the class."

Dr. Herbert Lee Stetson, president emeritus of Kalamazoo college, was seventy-nine years old Saturday, Oct. 16. Since 1900 he has been a member of the Kalamazoo faculty, first as professor of psychology and pedagogy, then as acting president, 1911-1913, then for nine years president of the college. Since 1922 he has served as president emeritus and professor of psychology and education; and finally he resigned his active part in the work of his department to become the plain of the college. He was graduated from the Baptist Union Theological seminary in 1878; he had already been ordained a Baptist minister. Eight years later he received the M. A. degree from Franklin college, Indiana. For three years following he was editor of the Indiana Baptist. In 1888 he went to Des Moines, Iowa, as pastor of the First church; a year later he became president of Des Moines college. He left to join the faculty of Kalamazoo college. In 1900 he received the D. D. degree was bestowed on him in 1889 by Franklin college in recognition of his services there. Des Moines college later bestowed on him the degree of Doctor of Laws. During the term of his residence in Kalamazoo he has also lectured on psychology and religion at the University of Chicago and Rochester Theological seminary. Although a New Englander by birth he has devoted almost his entire life to the cause of the religious and educational development of the Middle West.

Women all over the world are expected to join in a movement to make Mar. 4, 1927, a day of prayer for missions.

Georgia Baptists are not excessively timid about claiming what belongs to them. They are numerous and they can vote. Hence they would have the world observe that the next senator from that state, Hon. Walter F. George, the next governor of the state, Dr. L. G. Hardaman, and the next mayor of Atlanta, are all Baptists.

The bold pioneering of the Y. W. C. A. in religious and social thinking that has characterized this organization in the last few years seems to gather momentum. Under its initiative a "pioneer student conference" has been called to meet at Milwaukee, Dec. 28. From the Atlantic coast to the Pacific 2000 students are expected, to consider some of the topics that "are up-to-date or beyond," with a list of speakers that includes Miss Maude Royden and Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick.

Rev. John A. Howard, Baptist missionary at Contai, Bengal, India, attended recently a jungle heathen festival which he says "was as near to hell as anything can be." Here is what he saw: "According to good authority the fifteen or sixteen devotees had spent the night in drunkenness and adultery. When day broke, countless drums were beaten. Such a deafening uproar I never heard before. Men danced among coals of fire, stood on swords, measured their way along the road by prostrations in the dust, put hooks in their backs and swung from swinging poles in the air. Groups of six each, with double cords through their arms, danced in wild drunken frenzy. Bloody arms, bloody backs, deathly heat and the sickening stench from human blood made one feel how unspeakably great is India's need of a Saviour."

Happy Land

At Pacific Palisades

On account of its exceedingly mild climate—with a mean temperature during the winter season of 60 degrees and absolute freedom from frost—Pacific Palisades offers year-round outdoor recreational facilities for the children.

For the older children and adults there is surf bathing, horseback riding, hiking, and a great variety of game sports, including tennis. There are good golf courses close by. And for the little tots there is the ever popular sand pile or beach.

House, cabin and apartment rentals are surprisingly low at this Southern California resort which has been founded by Methodism for Christians of all denominations.

To secure a copy of our new folder, "Winter at Pacific Palisades," tear out this ad, write on it your name and address and mail to the Pacific Palisades Association, Pacific Palisades, California.

"Missionary Adventures of a New American", a thirty page pocket booklet written by Rev. A. Di Domenica, contains a thrilling story of the conversion of his family in Italy, besides additional interesting stories of Christian experience. It would be good reading for an evening in the prayer meeting or for a missionary meeting. Free copies may be secured by addressing the author at 1414 Castle Avenue, Philadelphia.

Miss Dorothy Campbell, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. George Campbell (many years engaged in mission work among the Hakkas of China), writes home to her parents at Los Angeles, Calif., a racy account of her arrival at Swatow in September to enter upon missionary service. Just before she left America a reunion of the family was held at the parental home, with four sons and four daughters present.

Samuel R. Guard of Chicago talked one Sunday evening over W L S, the radio station of the Sears-Roebuck Agricultural Foundation. His subject was "Rugged Religion." He received 10,341 letters of appreciation.

There has been a considerable agitation concerning the report that in certain colleges and universities in the United States there is discrimination against Jewish students. An investigation by the Jewish Daily Bulletin puts a quietus on the report. There seems to be no official discrimination, and social attitudes in the schools are about the same as those in the community generally.

One of the most pleasing achievements in the production of contemporaneous denominational records is an exhibit of the Los Angeles convention of the B. Y. P. U. A. for 1926. It is put up in magazine form on excellent paper, with first-class type work profusely illustrated with photographic cuts of persons, places, buildings and natural scenery, and contains a complete syllabus of the organized work of the young people and of the convention proceedings. It is fragrant with the spirit of Baptist youth and sets a new standard for the quality of denominational documents.

Dr. John R. Sampey with his new wife has returned from an evangelistic campaign in Brazil to his work in the Southern Baptist Theological seminary. His story of his campaign is a wonderful one of constant preaching under all sorts of conditions and in many places to hungry hearers and with 500 converts. He told in a missionary address of "missionaries using their meager salaries to build up their mission stations while their homes go neglected, of seeing through a father's eyes his own daughter with hardly a home in which to live, of missionaries in need of change and rest but afraid to come home for fear Baptist selfishness would prohibit their return."

Light upon war is steadily streaming into the minds of men. An alumnus of Yale university supplies a recent instance. Concerning a war memorial to be erected at Yale, the Yale Alumni Weekly had said editorially: "The war memorial will strike a note on the deepest plane of all, that of the general sacrifice of Yale lives for the saving of civilization in a dire world extremity." One of its readers, an alumnus, reins up the editor thus: "Isn't this rather thick? Is the high spiritual value to continue to be found in glorifying those who (unsuccessfully) tried to slaughter others? Are we all to continue to play into the hands of the army generals and the militarists? And, in the year of our Lord 1926, do even the unintellectual alumni of Yale believe that in fighting with France and Italy (!) and England and Roumania (!) and against Germany and Austria, we were 'saving civilization in a dire world of extremity'? I know you have to conform to the sacred phrases of the tribe (as do the leaders among my friends the Australian aborigines), but after all, isn't there a limit?"

Autumnal gifts of fruits and vegetables to the poor are suggested by the National Plant, Flower and Fruit Guild, 70 Fifth Ave., New York. Local church festivals at which such gifts may be assembled and distributed are a feature of the suggestion.

Seventeen million members of cooperative societies are reported from Russia, consumers' cooperatives having 10,000,000 members and producers' and farmers' cooperatives 7,000,000. And the leaders of the Eddy-Page party, lately returned from that country, say that the movement is growing fast.

The Baptist Bible institute of New Orleans specializes in training for gospel singers and musicians. It offers about a dozen different courses from a faculty of highly-trained teachers, all intent upon the varied ministries of sacred music whether of voice or of instruments. Expenses are low. In some of the courses tuition is free.

Some deacons may be interested in a question raised by H. P. Andrews of South Bend, Wash.: "Why does a church without a pastor give up its prayer meetings and Sunday services? Does not a layman enjoy the indwelling of the same Spirit who empowers and works through an ordained minister? When a church is pastorless, why do not the deacons take charge of the flock and keep them together in study, in intercession and soul-winning?"

According to the Canadian daily papers the threatened controversy in the Canadian Baptist Convention materialized with explosive energy. As reported, T. T. Shields and his group opened an attack upon McMaster university, on the alleged ground that there are heretics on its faculty, special objection being made to Prof. L. A. Marshall. Debate was "hectic." It resulted in a resolution to support the board of governors of the university by a vote of 708 to 258, and the passage of a motion introduced by A. J. Vining demanding an apology from Doctor Shields as a condition of future membership in the convention. According to the report, he declined to apologize. In the latter vote no doctrinal question was involved. Doctor Vining, the mover, is a pronounced conservative. So is Dr. John MacNeill who spoke against Doctor Shields. The ground announced for the motion of censure was "unjust attacks" on the university management "despite votes of confidence by the convention." The vote of censure passed by "a large majority." It called also for the expulsion of Doctor Shields from the board of governors of the university.

Detroit, contemplating its citizens' league, is disposed to "strut its stuff" measurably. For the league exists for the purpose of promoting among the people of Detroit an understanding of municipal affairs and general cooperation with all agencies of community service and progress. It has existed thirteen years and exhibits a proud record of quiet deeds. And its value may be judged by the fact that it has at the present time 3000 members.

Extension lectures in religion and leadership training have become an important adjunct to the work of the divinity school of the University of Chicago. This fall the Tuesday evening lecture courses deal with subjects of supreme current and vital interest. Under the heading of "Christian Doctrine in Modern Thought," Dean Shailer Mathews and Prof. Gerald Birney Smith "will discuss the transformation which with almost terrifying rapidity, has taken place in the last fifty years, in the conceptions of God, of nature, of man, of sin and redemption." Prof. H. L. Wiatt will offer six lectures on the Old Testament, and Prof. W. C. Bower on religion and education. Prof. C. T. Hoeman of the divinity school will give further information concerning the course. Courses open Tuesday evening, Nov.

Evolution and Religion in Education

By

Henry Fairfield Osborn

The most illuminating and timely of Professor OSBORN's recent essays and addresses on evolution and religion in their relationship to education are here presented, together with new statements of his views on the subject. The question of evolution and its religious significance becomes more and more a matter of concern to teachers and students of religion as well as to well-informed persons everywhere.

The Sky Is Clearing

DURING the recent years of contention, of leanness in our missionary treasuries, of retrenchment and withdrawals, of discouragements and disheartenings, many prayer has risen to the throne of God for the dawning of a better day. Thousands have longed for good understanding and cooperation and for the time to come when the whole denomination, rising up in its united strength, could face its united task and should unite in the cry, "Lead on, O King Eternal!" But no thoughtful one among us has imagined that such a happy outcome would emerge from some trifling and superficial modification of sentimental attitudes. Divisive and fundamental convictions have been too deep for the mere conjurations of artful leadership. Nothing could efface them and only some brighter common conviction of duty and experience of grace could so far subordinate them as to bind us together in a common task. Only God could so unite us.

Signs appear and multiply that such a day is at hand. Even in Washington at the very height and crisis of despair, a trained observer of assemblies could begin to discern that the comparative skill of disputants, the relative merits of hypothetical opinions and the strategy of parties are not the controlling factors of decision. A new spirit had begun to stir in the convention and it had manifestly moved into the convention from a tidal purpose just beginning to exert its pressure across a continent.

Indications more concrete, if not more convincing, appeared in the response to the masterful appeal of J. C. Bussee for an armistice and for a great cooperative evangelistic undertaking. Not merely the assembled delegates, but the constituency of the convention from ocean to ocean came to that appeal with a burst of enthusiasm. Preparation for such a campaign did not wait for direction from official headquarters. The churches themselves on their own initiative took up the work of evangelism in their own local fields in their own way. State conferences and pastors' retreats talked of little else and planned as they had not done for many years for the enlistment of the people in winning souls for Christ. The pulpits began to concentrate on the vital messages of the gospel. At the same time receipts of the missionary treasuries began to register the new spirit and from month to month to show gain over the corresponding months of last year.

One of the last places to catch a new note of encouragement is, naturally, official headquarters, because the last place for a new movement to register its meaning and value is where the grind of general administration is carried on. When more than a hundred official leaders of the Northern Baptist Convention assembled at Chicago Beach hotel in September to study the pros and cons of all things, the budget, they met in an atmosphere of gloom. But before the conference ended these burdened and jaded officials themselves began to sense a new day, caught the new spirit and departed to their specific tasks with a new enthusiasm.

Associational meetings and state conventions all over the country tell the same story. When the convention at Washington adjourned there was much talk of utilizing the opportunity for a referendum which under Baptist policy is always open to any who wish to invoke it. What has come of it? Certainly there has been no controversy raging across the field of the convention. A few churches, a few associations and a few state conventions have taken up the question of the conditions of church membership which was under discussion at Washington, and expressed themselves, generally without rancor, with little debate, without schism, in most cases unanimously, usually endorsing the prevalent custom of the churches, and without any interruption of the denominational program of evangelism and missions. And from all parts of the field come reports of large, harmonious and enthusiastic associations and state conventions.

Sometimes a single incident throws light on a general situation. One such incident occurred at the Illinois convention. University of Chicago men, as the custom is at conventions, held a banquet. Sixty persons were present. The expected speaker failed to arrive, whereupon the banquet was converted into an evangelistic conference marked by the spiritual intensity of a revival meeting. Much the same spirit was shown by the Louisville men at South Bend, Ind., and by Rochester men at Adrian, Mich. These are not isolated instances.

This happy augury grows out of something far apart from any surrender of doctrinal convictions on the part of anybody, and from the triumph of any faction. It grows out of a common awakening of our people to a common fellowship in truths, experiences and calls to life and service that lie deeper than all of our debates. And this awakening has come to be such a majestic experience that in its presence the voice of debate spontaneously subsides into silence. This interpretation is confirmed by many personal letters coming from all parts of the country to the office of THE BAPTIST, and by the personal testimony of visitors from many localities who stop in Chicago. At this time we seem to be witnessing a new muster of the Baptist hosts for a new and united march with God.

The State Convention Executive Secretary

IN THE days preceding the organization of the Board of Promotion and the launching of the New World Movement at Denver, Colo., in 1919, the executive secretary of the state convention was known as the superintendent of state missions. But with the development of the cooperative plan of denominational work by which all denominational agencies function through a board of the Northern Convention, the one who was the superintendent of state missions now assumes responsibility for a much larger area than his own state covers. The executive secretary of a state convention is also the legally appointed agent of the Board of Missionary Cooperation of the Northern Baptist Convention to represent in his state all the organized work of the denomination. This means that the promotion of foreign missions, for instance, is as much a corporate part of the work of a state executive secretary as the promotion of state missions. In other words, the state executive secretary is in reality a national secretary functioning in one state for the express purpose of developing the churches in that limited area to the fullest extent in harmony with the missionary, educational and philanthropic program of the denomination in its organized endeavor to evangelize and Christianize the whole world.

Presumably all executive secretaries of state conventions are fully aware of the big responsibilities attached to the office. Indeed, some of them are overburdened with the tremendous load as they attempt to bring all the churches of their states up to standard in support of the whole program of the denomination. It is a big task, and the task is not made easier by the provincial attitude of certain officials of state conventions who persist in fostering and propagating the idea that it is the sole business of the executive secretary to confine his work and interests to the state convention exclusively. Evidently it has not yet dawned on them that the state is only part of that larger unit which we call the Northern Baptist Convention and that the executive secretary of the state convention has been nationalized. The old day has gone never to return. The new day is here with its efficient cooperation and its larger horizons. Instead of going back we must go forward and make the unity between the states and the Northern Convention more complete.

In the present arrangement the Board of Cooperation without initiative accepts what the states offer. The state convention usually elects its own executive secretary without conference with or reference to the Board of Cooperation. The Board of Cooperation is therefore forced to rubber-stamp an official which it has had no part in choosing and which it has no power to dismiss. This unsatisfactory arrangement is partly responsible for the failure of state convention officials to appreciate the fact that the state executive secretary is the legal representative of the Northern Baptist Convention through his appointment by the administrative committee of the Board of Cooperation as its agent in a particular state. Possibly if the contact between the state convention and the Board of Cooperation were closer, and if the state executive secretary could sit in more frequently with the administrative committee where it meets in regular sessions in New York, his burden would not seem so heavy and he would lose that sense of limitation which state boundaries impose upon him while the president and members of the board of managers of the state convention regard him as a strictly local official.

Queen Marie and the Liberty Bell

THE 4000 miles that lie between Roumania and Pennsylvania were annihilated the other day when Queen Marie sat under the liberty bell. Philadelphia and Bucharest shook hands under the symbol of that freedom which was wrested from kings and queens only 150 years ago. The fact that a real queen visited Philadelphia where the signing of the Declaration of Independence is being celebrated in the sesquicentennial exposition stirs the imagination. What changes fifteen decades have wrought! John Hancock could not possibly have dreamed of the granddaughter of a British queen, herself a queen, even paying homage to the bell which rang out the political independence of the American colonies and thereby announced the beginning of an unprecedented experiment in democratic government. And yet in the comparatively short time that has passed since John Hancock affixed his bold signature to the magna charta of American liberty the whole world has moved in the direction of the principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence. Even Roumania has a very limited monarchy, and the people through their elected representatives administer the affairs of the government. Therefore when the queen of Roumania comes to America and visits the shrines of political, civil and religious freedom, she is simply giving expression to the spirit which is moving the whole world toward international fellowship based upon brotherhood, equality and the right of every man "to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

We write this with a full appreciation of the restrictions placed upon Baptists in Roumania. Next to Russia, no European state has less religious liberty than Roumania. The state church of Roumania is the Greek Orthodox and there seems to be a disposition on the part of the government to give that church a monopoly in caring for the religious needs of the people. Consequently dissenters, and especially Baptists, are not free to worship God according to the dictates of conscience, but must conform their worship and religious activities to the annoying and restrictive regulations imposed upon them by the state. Again and again the Baptist commissioner for Europe, Dr. J. A. Rushbrooke, has petitioned Roumanian government officials to lift the embargo on Baptists and allow them the liberty which Baptists enjoy in almost every other progressive country, but for one reason and another full religious liberty is still withheld in Roumania.

Is it too much to hope that when Queen Marie returns to her own land and people she will carry with her much of the atmosphere and spirit of '76 that Roumania will catch the radiance of her influence and at once begin to extend to all its people the fullest measure of religious liberty consistent with justice, equality and inherent rights?

The World in Transit

An interpretation of significant events in the light of Christian ideals

The United States of Europe May Be Nearer than We Think

This page has harped considerably upon the necessity and hope of a federation of European nations. It is, therefore, gratifying to read from Henry A. Atkinson, general secretary of the American branch of the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, who has toured and studied Europe for years, a statement that "every thinking man in Europe today recognizes that the only hope of Europe is in the formation of some kind of a United States of Europe." "Everything at present," he says, "is moving in this direction . . . The situation in Europe is decidedly improving . . . I have been impressed with the better attitude of the people toward the various problems, the lessening of the spirit of hate and a new determination to find the better way in international affairs . . . The League of Nations has readily gained the respect and confidence of all the nations." The United States may be open to serious criticism for its isolationism during recent years, but if its example of the union of states shall inspire in other nations practical faith in the principle of the international federation of commonwealths, many of its own fears and failings may be forgiven.

Mahmoud Essad Bey Talks Like a Propagandist or a Statesman

The new republic of Turkey comes as near as anything in history to being a nation born in a day. It seems yesterday that "the unspeakable Turk" was an orthodox phrase. Now, Turkey has laid the foundations of a modern republic, which, in the words of Mahmoud Essad Bey, Turkish minister of justice, is engaged in an endeavor to obtain for our country the best that western civilization has to offer in its varied domain of activities. Gone is the imperial khalifat and the everlasting threat of holy war of Islam. Gone are the atrocities of political and racial hate and of arbitrary power. Gone, if we may believe Mahmoud, are the Christian slave girls in Turkish harems. Even the harems are gone. He says, "There are no Christian women in Turkish harems and there are no Turkish harems." For a legal basis of administration the nation has adopted the German commercial code, the Italian penal code and—as if to top all the marvels of this unique revolution—the Swiss civil code. Permit us to believe that this representation is not propaganda but an expression of a nation's sincerity and a new contribution to the advance of civilization.

Debs' Voice Is Now Silenced Forever

To say the friendly notices in the papers, in style funeral and elegiac. What an error! Think of the long line of men before him who for conscience went to prison or to the stake. Are the voices of Wycliffe, Huss, Savonarola, and Roger Williams, William Lloyd Garrison and Elijah McCoy "silenced forever"? On the contrary, they speak ever. In recent years the public has begun to understand that Debs was not an anarchist, a bolshevist, a thing to be feared and damned, but that according to his light he was a patriot and a pleader for human brotherhood. One who knew him best knew the sweet gentleness of his spirit. And it is surprising how far, since the famous campaign of the "Red Special," the world has moved in the direction in which the finger of Debs was pointing. The world will probably never be all that he dreamed but it will become a world that would have satisfied his hunger for human kindness. And his cry will not cease. Love will rear a monument to his memory. Pilgrim feet from the ends of the earth will visit the shrine of his ashes. And some time, when more light and understanding shall have come among men, he will be remembered in the full significance of his name, Eugene Victor Debs.

The Student "Scab" Takes Account of Himself

The first general conference of students who spend their summers as manual laborers was held at Richmond, Ind., in September. Among the problems considered was that of competition with other workers in industry. The conference was unanimous in condemning the use of students as "scabs" in industrial conflicts, and also the practice of underbidding local wage rates. It called for a more vital presentation of the social sciences by the faculty and suggested that professors, college pastors and religious workers seek experience by going into industry as manual workers. Students present had been employed in a large variety of industries. Distinguished specialists, such as W. P. Hapgood, Powers Hapgood, Miss Sadie Goodman, James Myers, Tom Tippet and Kate Richards O'Hare, participated in the conference. Eleven evils of the existing industrial order were listed for discussion, and one whole session was devoted to the profit motive which was "unanimously condemned as un-Christian and the root of many evils".

Cats Assemble to Promote Program of Vegetarianism

The conceit is borrowed from that peculiar genius, Dhan Gopal Mukerji, who, when contemplating the League of Nations assembly, compared it to a herd of cats discussing vegetarianism. Like most metaphors, this one is smart rather than just. Of course, most if not all of the nations both in the league and out of it are plutocratic and predaceous to a greater or less degree. Of course, peace is not possible in a predatory and plutocratic civilization. But the league was created under the pressure of a higher ideal and of the conscious need for a different sort of civilization. And it was framed with a view to the building of a political order which would be neither plutocratic nor imperialistic. In fact, it was so built that it could endure and succeed only by eliminating those elements in existing society, predatory, autocratic, plutocratic or imperialistic which interfere with the achievement of true and universal democracy. The proper course is not to break up the meeting but to hold the cats to the program.

Can Any Good Thing Come out of Le Zoute?

What is born in a town may be its only and sufficient claim to greatness. This may prove to be so with the little town of Le Zoute in Belgium. In September nearly 250 persons white and black, representing thirteen countries and sixty-three missionary societies, met there to consider Africa. Both African and American negroes had their say and said it. Racial contacts, health, native welfare, protection of the natives in the rights of land and labor, government, church problems, cooperation, evangelization, education and all the rest came under review. The program was like an epic poem. It cannot be even sketched here. But it resulted in understandings and in formulated findings that will mark a new day for Africa. The world will be hearing about them for a generation to come.

Fares, Please

"I am debtor both to the Greeks and the barbarians; both to the wise and unwise."—Paul the Apostle.

BY BERNARD C. CLAUSEN

IT IS always an advantage to be able to reduce your philosophy to two words.

Once you have arrived at your point of view, you have not finished your task. It still remains for you to hammer your truth down into recognizable and rememberable phrases.

It is not easy to determine whether correct thinking or clever phrasing is the more important. Many a vital truth has been thwarted for centuries because it was poorly expressed. And many a half-truth has passed currency for generations merely because it was so glibly phrased that it stayed long in the mind and leaped often to the lips.

No wonder then that philosophers have spent much of their time in a conscientious effort with words. Over the gate of Apollo's temple at Delhi was inscribed that stimulating Greek challenge, "Know thyself." Epicurus coined the injunction, "Enjoy thyself." The stoics replied with a curt, "Restrain thyself." Buddha summed up his advice in "Extinguish thyself."

And I say, "Fares, please!" As fresh as paint, as persistent as a chestnut burr, as meaningful as a baby's cry, it represents the superdistillation of modern civilization's frank demand upon the individual: "Fares, please!"

One of the most interesting experiences in a preacher's life occurs when he watches a congregation in the process of realizing that pledges are about to be taken. It is a unique test of the quality of the gospel which he has previously been preaching to them. When the missionary hymns are announced, a vague uneasiness creeps into the atmosphere. When the scripture is read, its message confirms the general suspicion. When the cards are noticed in the pews and the waiting pencils with freshly sharpened points are discovered near each worshiper, the expectation is absolute. And when the preacher begins on his sermon, he can almost always detect at least one man in the congregation who is frankly and openly regretful that he happened to attend on this occasion.

Money, Money, Money!

The victim in question is shifting nervously in his seat. He eyes, with some resentment, his wife, who is sitting next him, and he penetrates her oblivion with a look which seems to say, "Well, this is a pretty mess you have hooked me into!" He is trying to look as small as he can in his pew, and back in his mind a cynical whisper is arising, "Oh, they are going to ask for money again. I never come to church without hearing this eternal ding-donging for money. It is always money, money, money, money! Can't I ever find a place where I won't be asked for money?"

There was one such man in the congregation on a certain Sunday when pledges were invited. He grew almost apoplectic in his rage, and I decided to follow him, at least imaginatively, as he left the church. He waited on the corner for a streetcar to roll up, and when it arrived, he started to board it. But his eyes confronted a gold-lettered sign: "Pay as you enter!" and the conductor said quietly, "Fares, please." My angry friend, hearing, in this commonplace demand, only an echo of the sermon of the morning, turned angrily, muttered, "Asking for money again!" and alighted from the car, leaving the conductor somewhat puzzled and greatly amused.

That afternoon he started up his automobile and hurried off for a ride. He pulled up alongside a filling station and prepared to fill his tank with gasoline. But before the hose could be inserted, his eyes glanced at a sign hanging above the gas pump, quoting the current price, twenty-four cents a gallon. In a rage, he opened the throttle, jerked in his gears and sped away, taking with him his thundercloud of anger as he muttered, "Money again! Isn't there any place where a man can be spared from that eternal brazen demand?"

The next morning he found it necessary to visit the grocer's for some household supplies, and when he mentioned the list he had in mind, the grocer was rude and brutal enough to state that butter was forty-five cents a pound. Our infuriated friend stormed out of the store like a miniature reproduction of the wrath of Jove, and as he slammed the door, I heard him say, "That's all you hear, nowadays! Everywhere you go, you find people who are interested in you only for your money!"

The tax bill lay on his desk as he arrived at the office. This was the last straw. He was wild with suppressed fury. I wanted to help him. So I hurried to his side, and said, "Do you really want to live in a place where nobody will ever ask you for money? If you really want to free yourself entirely from these demands, come with me."

He ran his distracted fingers through his hair, and whispered hoarsely, "Yes, I want to find such a place! I should like to go there right now. But you are deceiving me. There is no such place. Why, even in church—"

Where Financial Responsibility Ceases

"Listen, my friend," I interrupted, "there are two places near here where you could live from one year's end to another without ever being asked for a cent of money. One is a cell in our jail; the other is a padded ward in our insane asylum."

He turned on me, thought for a moment, caught the point, shuddered as he glanced toward the barred window of our prison and the gaunt walls of our asylum, then said, "You're right. I was a fool to want to escape that way. Of course the world has a right to ask me for money."

Certainly the church asks for money! There is nothing shameful about our purpose. We are proud of our insistence. The only shame should be felt by those who are unreasonable enough to resent it. Fares, please!

The most natural reply in the world is that which is already rising in many minds at this moment. Men are saying, "Of course, I am willing to pay my own fare. I shall not even hunch down in my seat and try to see if I am smaller than I am, so that the conductor will pass me on a half-ticket. I shall do my full duty. But let it end there. I refuse to pay for anybody else. Count me out when it comes to fares for Africa and India and China and orphans and blind men and crippled children. I have enough to do to pay my own fare."

At first glance, the logic of this position seems unassailable. Nothing disarms us quite so effectively as this immediate and frank willingness with which men profess to pay their own way, if the transaction can end there.

But that is precisely what you cannot do. Nobody in all the world has ever succeeded in paying his own fare.

it cannot be done. The organization of civilized life prevents it.

You plan a railroad journey. You buy a ticket for your destination. The ticket-seller names a price. You put down your money at the ticket-window, the clerk delivers your ticket and the change, and you hurry toward the tracks with a comfortable sense that you have completely paid your exact fare. But have you?

Your money which you have just exchanged for that ticket did nothing toward laying these gleaming rails. They were purchased and put in place months before you ever began to plan the purchase of your ticket today. Your money did not help to cut these ties and build this crushed-one right-of-way. Your fare had no part in building this huge locomotive, designing and constructing these passenger cars, mining and transporting this coal, or training this engineer who is to guide you over these rails to your destination. Even your cardboard ticket was planned and printed long before they knew that you were planning to travel that way.

All these things were done without help from your fare. They were done out of other people's fares. Somebody else paid for your journey. If you insist upon paying for exactly what you yourself enjoy, no more and no less, you cannot ride at all.

The best you can do is to pay enough for your ticket without complaining, so that somebody else may have the chance to ride as comfortably and as safely some future day. You can pass on the blessings of swift transportation, intact, or improved, to some one in the future. But this is the only way in which you can be said to pay your fare. Such is railroading. Such is life.

Hundreds of years ago an ardent Christian wrote a sentence which has puzzled me ever since I first read it. Paul wrote, "I am debtor both to the Greeks, and to the barbarians; both to the wise and to the unwise. So . . . I am ready to preach the gospel to you that are at Rome also." It seems like an absurd way for a man to pay debts. He confesses that he owes much to Greeks and Barbarians. Yet he does not attempt to pay them. He knows that he cannot. The only recourse he has is to make his payments to the Romans. So far as we know, he owes the Romans nothing. But he really owes it to them to pay them for what he has received from the Greeks and barbarians. It is the only way to pay debts after all. Fares, please!

The only way to be truly grateful for the America which we inherit is to pass on a better America to our children. The only way to pay for the gospel is to scatter the gospel gladly over all the world. The greatest mistake in the world of economics is made by the man who insists that he will enjoy nothing for which he does not directly pay and will pay for nothing that he himself does not enjoy. He could not conscientiously ride a mile on a railroad, buy a single copy of a newspaper, or eat a slice of bread, or come to church. The thing cannot be done. We are irrevocably bound together. Fares, please!

The Power of Friendship

BY EDWIN E. SUNDT

SOME years ago a son of the old world was admitted to the United States of America. He came here godless, penniless and friendless, but with many ambitions and aspirations. Experience shattered his dreams. Life was hard. Acquiring a new language was trying. He had no friends. He traveled a lonely road. A loving Father understood though the lad did not understand him. A young American girl offered to teach the immigrant. Her influence was revolutionary. Quietly she imparted to her student a new vision and a sense of God. The power of friendship rescued the agnostic. He became a member of a church, taught in Sunday school and finally entered a theological seminary. Today he serves a rural community. And the girl rules the manse.

In his parish this pastor found a man reputed to be endless. A friendship founded upon the same love that rescued the immigrant changed the unhappy, lonely, despairing man into a useful citizen and an efficient officer of the church. Down in the valley lived an old couple. They were feeble and neglected. Twice a day the reborn man walked miles to this home. He cared for their needs; he provided the necessary wood and furnished financial aid without mentioning it to any one save his friend, the immigrant-pastor. Today he is one of the most loved and useful citizens as well as a loyal supporter of a church he once refused to enter. Friendship won him.

Last winter after a terrible snow storm word came to the parsonage that a woman was seriously ill. Roads were impassable. The town physician could not reach the suffering one. The same love that had won the immigrant helped him through four miles of deep snow to that distant home in the woods. Here he spent many dark hours. A few days after the funeral a letter came containing two snap-shots. They showed the footprints of the pastor in the white snow! Beneath the picture the woman's daughter had written: "The foot prints of a friend!" A man was troubled with rheumatism. It was suggested that massage would be of benefit. Years before, this same pastor had done work in athletics and learned some of the principles of massaging, so he promptly applied his knowledge. The "parson" became the masseur, and won the family's everlasting gratitude. One Sunday he told this story from the pulpit. "I've found a family in need. They must have their winter's supply of wood, which means about $20. I want you to send it to them." The "plates" were passed and this rural congregation responded with $20.41. Last winter he carried his stereopticon lantern into several private homes where invalid, or aged parishioners live and there, in the presence of a few, sometimes ten, often less, he flashed the story of Christian missions upon improvised screens. In his church vacation school last summer he had thirty-five children of which fully 75 per cent came from non-American homes. He tries to let no case of need or sickness escape his attention. He is a friend of man.

An Autumn Garden

HOW different, and yet the same, this place
Hidden by hedges that the frost has licked
With scorching, scarlet tongue. 'Tis here were picked
The first faint May-buds. In the selfsame place
Now zinnias sway, and the pale tentative
Narcissus-blooms have yielded place to phlox
In purple hosts. The marigold now mocks
The tawny dahlia that must flaunt to live.

Children and Their Books

Let us open all the doors that books can unlock.

BY LOUISE SEAMAN

THE great book is the lucky accident, the gift from the skies, the unforeseen, the words that were put down inevitably because the hand that wrote them had to write.

We all believe that, and repeat that such books are the only ones worth keeping before children. We turn them into so-called "children's books"—the Bible, Homer, Shakespeare, the Mabinogion, Gulliver, with broad margins and lovely pictures, because the children do not like our own homely editions which hurt their eyes and do not lure their imaginations swiftly enough. Sometimes we overdo our faith in the pictorial, but generally today the greatest of old enduring writings come to the children in the loveliest form.

The young people could live on Milton and Blake, Bach and Beethoven, Durer and Botticelli more contentedly than most of their elders suspect. But there are doors and windows in this modern world opening on so many vistas, coloring so brightly the picture of the past, awakening such children. Her husband, Herbert Asquith, has written delightful poetry in his new book, "Pillicock Hill." They are verses which grew for his children, just as Mr. Milne grew for Christopher Robin.

And when will Walter de la Mare tell us the whole story of the children for whom he wrote each book of poems each play? "A Child's Day" seems to have grown about some lovely photographs of a small child not his own; and the poems in "Flora" were written for the child Pamela Bianco's pictures. But his own children must have heard them first, and must have listened to "Peacock Pie." There is magic and nonsense and a quick tossing of fine English words, fully as important as Mother Goose and Shakespeare, and for some the only step between.

Besides this imaginative original writing, the child of today can be carried away to strange lands through true folk lore. The John Newbery medal in 1925 went to Charles Finger's "Tales of the Silver Lands," a book of South American Indian legends. In 1926 this distinguished award was given to "The Shen of the Sea," by Arthur Chrisman, a book of Chinese fairy tales. Younger children can go to South America with a real Indian boy of their own age, nicknamed for his pet, "Red Howling Monkey." He is sketched and his story is told by Helen Damrosch Tee-Van, artist for Mr. Beebe's expeditions to Guiana. These younger readers have simple tales of real Chinese children in Dorothy Rowe's "The Rabbit Lantern."

The greatest contribution to children's literature in this field is that of Padraic Colum, the Irish poet and dramatist now living in America. Mr. Colum has so arranged this great epic material that young people reading it are close to the actual words and spirit of the original, yet are held by the progress of the plot and carried through the complete story as swiftly as a child needs to be. His "Children's Homer," "The Golden Fleece," "The Children of Odin," "The King of Ireland's Son," "The Island varied powers and talents, that their reflection in books cannot be resisted.

And of all these new books it is not astonishing to think how many came into being with the help of the children themselves. There was "Alice," told by a real Alice, by a real rabbit-hole. There was "The Rose and the Ring," done as a Christmas present for lonely Londoners in Paris. There was Hans Andersen, talking and making his cut-outs for no end of children in Denmark.

Today we have the Biancos, that talented family whose children are almost grown; their own toys gave us such masterpieces as "The Velveteen Rabbit," "The Little Wooden Doll," "Poor Cecco," written by their mother, Margery Williams Bianco. These are the perfect stories of inanimate things given character and life. They have strength and simplicity, poetic beauty, wit and kindness, the ending that is clearly right to the child mind.

Then there are the Bowens. In that family, a rather solemn lawyer father stuck thin manuscripts into the Christmas stockings. Those that were saved made some of the most unusual children's books of our time: "The Enchanted Forest," "The Old Tobacco Shop," "Solario the Tailor," "Merrimeg." These are literature for the slightly older boy or girl with a turn for fantasy, a quick wit, a love of plot. As Mrs. Bianco's hark back to the English nursery and to the Italy which is her adopted home, not for scene but for mood, so Mr. Bowen's go back to the English tradition; to the older person there is a richness of humor, pathos, symbolism here which the child passes over for the story and realizes suddenly long after the books have been read and reread.

Another family where love of children and of books has made more books inevitable, is that of Lady Cynthia Asquith. "The Flying Carpet" was her charming treasure hunt for the best among present-day English writing for the Mighty," "The Voyagers," make a shelf of key-books for any child's library. Only a true poet could have done this so beautifully without "speaking down" to children and with sufficient sense of excitement and suspense; or a scholar could do it so thoroughly and honestly.

These are all "gift books" in the sense that they have a colorful make-up; they appeal to the eye at once as apart from the routine of life; they have the magic touch with and without they demand bright wrappings and ribbons all are finding their places on hard-worked library shelves but they are also the "special" books that literary people demand at Christmas and read aloud with equal delight themselves and to the small person squatting on a cushion close by. The doors to which they give the key are most of the fancy; they brighten those facets of the mind that will turn soon with deeper understanding to philosophy and satire, the great wits and the great poets.

There is a different sort of book, peculiarly American, made even more definitely by the aid and demand of the children themselves. It is the "bread and butter book," seldom seen on the gift-book tables, closest of all to our modern world, and so far, entirely too humble in its pretensions. I mean, such books as Hawsworth's "The Story of a Pebble," Abbott's "Everyday Mysteries," Lafarge's "Alice in Orchestralia," Hill and Maxwell's "Charlie books," "The History of Everyday Things in England," Darrow's "Boy's Own Book of Great Inventions," Renfell's "Yourself and Your Body," Plimpton's "Your Workshop."

Take "Buried Cities," by Jennie Hall. For that book, a teacher traveled in Greece and Italy, used her stories of digging for these cities, of life as it used to be lived in them, with her classes. It was the children who shaped their final form. And for them, the pictures were grouped at the end of each story, with their full, talkative captions, not interrupting the stories themselves. This is a practical book in the sense that it goes under the arm to museums, inspires other teachers to similar use of their own material, gives a modern travel background to mythology, and through its own charm and spirit, gives one a quickened sense of the making of history. You or I may find the stone, the helmet, the arrowhead, on which some whole great story hangs.

There are many who think that we overemphasize the emotional response in our children by too much romance and poetry. There are many who think the imaginative poetic side of a child's life suffers in an age of mechanics, handicrafts, athletics. The lucky child lives where balance in these things is his natural heritage. Power over his own small world, discipline of himself, strength and skill in his hands and feet is his first right. Then if those about him love books, talk of them, quote them, leave them about, books too will find their inevitable place, not out of proportion, in his happiest days, and his imagination will grow to stir his will to greater deeds.

But some children do not even guess at this balance of living until books picture it for them. Their doors and windows are few. They pass by the wild, the strange, the multi-colored, the grandly morose, with a sense of antagonism, even of fear. This only happens when things dull, cheap, usual, repetitious, have surrounded them; the same bedtime stories, the same comics, the same "series." Let us open all the doors that books can unlock. These books so briefly mentioned are but a beginning.

*"But, at the falling of the tide,
The golden birds still sing and gleam,
The Atlanteans have not died,
Immortal things still give us dream.
"The dream that fires man's heart to make,
To build, to do, to sing or say
A beauty death can never take,
An Adam from the crumbled clay."*

—John Masefield.

Books, the Home and the Nation*

By SARAH BYRD ASKEW

BOOKS are a factor in everything that makes the home happy and the nation prosperous.

Good character on the part of the people is essential to the success of both. Nothing builds character so much as a book whose hero or heroine measures up to the standards of Christianity. It need not be a book of sermons. It may make a far deeper impression if it is a story where character is translated into action. Many books of adventure have taught honor, responsibility, courage and patriotism.

A good book gives a delightful, wholesome occupation for idle time. No matter how busy the family in a home may be, such a time does arrive, especially with the children. What we do with our busy time does not count much as what we do with our idle time. Boys and girls who have been taught to read for pleasure have a powerful safeguard against evil, the more powerful in that it is pleasure which keeps them in the family circle. Anything which promotes family life does much to promote the life of the nation.

One mother said: "My children are contented to stay home now that we have something to read, and they are willing to help me about the work so that we can get time to finish the new book together. It is such fun to talk it over. Night before last Jack became quite excited because he thought the man he liked so much in the book was going to do the wrong thing; so he hustled us all through dinner so we could find out what he did." That is comradeship. A book read together, a story told and shared creates a bond that is not easily broken. Best of all, in binding this bond does not enslave.

We all want our boys and girls to be efficient, for efficiency means success in life. Every man and woman who is in any line today reads and studies; therefore, the children should acquire the habit of using books in their work.

One boy who gets his fun through reading Western stories, plastered the house through the aid of a book on plastering; and a girl who says she has traveled to the far corners of the earth through books, baked the prize loaf of bread for the exhibit at her rural school through the aid of a book on baking.

Many books and poems tell of the beautiful things around us, and appreciation of these things makes us more happy and contented. A scowling, sulky boy said, "There's nothing on a farm that anybody could write about." He was surprised to learn that Bobbie Burns was a farmer, and that one of his finest poems was to a field mouse that he had turned up in plowing. It adds romance even to potatoes to know that a whole nation was once saved from famine by them. Almost every one of our everyday commonplace things was at one time strange and wonderful, and through books we can make them so again.

We want the children to live the Bible. The child who reads Bible stories, and learns about Palestine, and loves to read poetry, can appreciate more fully the Bible and him who walked in beauty among the lilies across the sea.

We talk much of old things and old ways, and about returning to the ways of our fathers. Many of the leaders of our nation were country boys, but they read and studied. Abraham Lincoln did without sufficient food and clothes, fire and shoes, and walked twenty miles barefooted to get books, and he said, "He who lends me a book is truly my friend." Benjamin Franklin, who started the first free lending library, said that by the means of those books he was enabled to get the education that his father had not been able to give him.

In order to build our nation we must give our children books about our country and its great men to teach them so to love this country that they will give it the best that is in them. Patriotism is not jingoism; it is not doffing the hat as the flag goes by; it is living up to our responsibilities toward nation, state, county, and town. This kind of patriotism comes to one only from a knowledge of the great traditions of a country. The child who through books has learned that this country was first settled under great privation and danger by those who sought religious and civic liberty and sacrificed themselves that we might have this freedom, will be far more prone to keep those laws, which are really our Bill of Rights. This does not refer so much to textbooks as to stories that make these people real living beings.

We talk peace, but the only way to win peace is by education. We can teach our children through the books they read of the great things that have come to us through other countries. Take them up on a high mountain and show them all peoples of the earth so that they may understand them.

We may say that we have not time to read; but the mother who puts aside reading to her children so that she may sew or cook is often putting aside the greater thing for the less. Our motto should be, "Sane minds in sound bodies." As a man reads, so he thinks, and as a man thinks, so he is.

We are a product of heredity, environment and the grace that God has planted within us. No child ever chose its parents, no child ever chose its surroundings and many a child has had to fan that spark of grace himself in order to keep alive the fire of ambition. What food is to the body, books are to the mind: without food the body dies, without books the mind fails to grow. We are now in the year of our sesquicentennial. We want to see that our boys and girls have the books within their reach which will teach them to be true citizens of this great nation. Memorials may be built of wood and stone; but they will not last so long, or so greatly reward those who have shed their blood to establish and maintain this nation, as the memorial we may develop of the boys and girls of the coming generation, making a nation worthy of the price at which it was bought and its liberties preserved.

What One Booklover Did

In an old book store on Broadway stood a woman who had been a country girl in the far South behind the dark pines. Through many states, by many ways, she had come to New York and won what she called success. The years were long since she had been seen in the old home, but she went back through memory's trail called out by the magic of a dog-eared book. Just a novel, but it was one her father had read aloud to her while they were sitting on a weather-beaten porch one summer afternoon; and just as on that summer afternoon she had slipped from reality into the great old days of romance, so now she lived again that summer afternoon. The father had gone to his eternal home many years before, but through that book the old place called.

She went back to find another generation growing up. Many had left who formerly held the valley in great affection. Some were newcomers and did not hold the old things in high esteem. Into that valley which had seemed to her Arcadia had come a spirit of unrest, and the young people longed for the cities. Remembering what the old Sunday-school library and her father's books had meant to her, she journeyed back and forth, gathering ten cents here, and a quarter there, like Benjamin Franklin, until she had enough money to buy a few books for the school and some for the Sunday school she had loved. Some of the people wanted to read and some did not; but here a boy, there a girl, here a mother and there a father became interested. She held reading circles and story hours to which some came from miles around.

At first she planned to go back to the position she had left in the North, but the day came when she said, "They are my people; I belong to them, and here I shall stay." She took the school and built up a library. There were many ups and downs, and sometimes she wondered where the road would lead; but finally, as she watched the boys and girls of the valley growing up to be real citizens in the true definition of the word, which is: "The man or woman who does his job in the world in the best way possible from the highest motive possible," she felt that she had built far better than she knew. Out of that valley went men and women who have made their mark in the world and the world is the better for them.

One man said to me, "Why should my children have more than I had?" Why, that is the way civilization is built. Our fathers who came to this country would probably have been far happier in the old country, but for the sake of their children they made the break and so the torch has been handed down to us. Let us see that we put the world a little forward and help this generation to be not only more prosperous, but wiser, better and happier.

Knowledge Is Safety

For this we need books, books in the home, books in the schoolroom, town libraries, county libraries, to give adequate book service to all the citizens of our nation.

Libraries and books are not new things. They are as old as civilization. It was only when the printing press was invented and books began to come within the reach of the people, that civilization really began, liberty came into the world and true Christianity came into its own. Books bring down to us from the past man's discoveries that we may build on them the highest ideals, the best thoughts and the greatest endeavors of all ages.

Even if libraries and books were new things, we should give them to our children, for we are not training them for yesterday or even for today; we are training them for tomorrow. The security and well-being of tomorrow must be founded upon a knowledge of today and of the yesterday. Knowledge is safety.

In 1848 a senator said that he would not vote one dollar to help build a trail to Oregon because Oregon could not really become part of the union since it took a year to get a message there and a year to get an answer; the other night, sitting in a New Jersey town, I heard a chorus in Portland, Ore., singing, "America the Beautiful." The success of the future depends on our grafting the new on the best of the old.

If we do without some things, it does not matter to us long—a new hat, a new dress, a visit to the city—but if these boys and girls do without the books they need, the days in school that they need, it will matter to them in the day they go down into their graves, and that may be seventy-five years from now. For the sake of a little more comfort for ourselves we have handicapped them for life. It is not an entirely unselfish matter either, because our happiness and prosperity depend on these boys and girls, our future citizens and rulers.

Some of the same stock that gave us Washington, Boone, Jefferson, Marshall, Lincoln and many other statesmen, ministers, teachers, and leaders, went back into the mountains to live, shut off from the world. As time went by they gave their children no books and no schools; today we are sending money to reeducate these people, so that they may come into their own again and do their part in furthering the growth of this nation.

Then and Now

BY MARY J. THOMAS

WHAT would be the reaction of the favored child of today with books, Books, BOOKS—dozens of them, sometimes hundreds of them—poetry, drama, nature stories, fairy stories, and just stories—illustrated by the best artists, put out in style de luxe—were he taken back to the dearth of the day of the Rev. Cotton Mather whose "Token" for children bore this unalluring title: "Token for the Children of New England, or Some Examples of Children in Whom the Fear of God was Remarkably Budding When They Died, in Several Parts of New England."

And for a choice sample of the poems that the children of that day read, here is one:

"I in the burial place may see

Graves shorter far than I;
From death's arrest no age is free.

Young children, too, may die."

In the "Meddlesome Matty and other Poems for Infant Minds" by the Taylor sisters, published about 125 years ago, recently reissued by the Viking Press) here are such moralizing bits as this:

The ducks, I perceived, began loudly to quack

When they saw the poor fowl floating dead on its back.

And by their grave gestures and looks in discoursing

Obedience to parents were plainly enforcing."

Contrast with that:

"I want to think of you, dear God,

A million times a day—

At home, and when I am in school,

And when I am at play!

No matter who is by or where

I am, or what I do,

I know that I can always send a thought, God, to you."

("A Child on His Knees," Macmillan)

Volume after volume of beautiful, up-to-date picture-word poems are now published for children. No child's life should be without poetry any more than it could be without music.

From "Sons of Kai," Macmillan

Brinker or the Silver Skates," by Mary Mapes Dodge and "The Last Days of Pompeii," by Bulwer Lytton, (each $2.50). It would be stupid reading matter indeed that any child could resist when put up in such fashion—the best of paper, large print, and exquisite illustrations in colors. What would a "token" child have said had such a treasure come into his possession?

"The Dove in the Eagle's Nest," by Charlotte M. Yonge and "The Alhambra," by Washington Irving (Macmillan, each $1.75), two classics for children put out in the most readable form with both colored and black-and-white illustrations, are books that will enthral children twelve to fifteen years old (and considerably older, the writer will guarantee) and set their minds toward the right goal in reading. Another story of Charlotte Yonge's, illustrated in colors and in black and white, is "The Chaplet of Pearls" (Page, $2), a wholesome story with a historical background and a fascinating tale for boys and girls from twelve years up. We have yet to read anything from the pen of Johanna Spyri that does not have in it the elements that make for permanence. "Eveli and Beni," another of her stories of Swiss child life (Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 60 cents, net), attractively printed, has just appeared. And even the "littlest people" are remembered with a classic—none other than J. M. Barrie's "Peter Pan and Wendy," retold by May Byron in big print and delightfully illustrated. (Charles Scribner's Sons, $1.) In planning children's reading, remember the classics. Why give them the froth of trash when they can have the bread of real literature?

If there is a child, big or little, who does not love animal stories we have not met him. An animal book—and much more, as its title indicates, is "Sully Joins the Circus," by Allen Chaffee (Century Co., $1.75), beautifully printed and illustrated. This book and real boys from twelve years up belong together. "Our Friends at the Zoo," by Julia T. E. Stoddart, (Thomas Y. Crowell Co., $1.50 net) attractively illustrated in colors and in black and white, printed in most readable type, is a book that will give boys and girls a visit to the zoo every day in the year if they wish—for the book almost seems to be the zoo. Another zoo book is "Mr. Possum Visits the Zoo," by Frances Joyce Farnsworth (Abingdon Press, 75 cents) which takes children most enjoyably and intimately on a round of the zoo. "Animal Tales of the Rockies," by Albert B. Cunningham (Abingdon Press, $1) is no zoo book, but it is the story of wild life in the Rocky mountains told by a man who knows from intimate contact the life of which he writes. Another "real wild animal" book is "Red Howling Monkey," by Helen Damrosch Tee-Van (Macmillan, $2), which transports the reader right into the heart of a South American jungle—it is the true story of a South American Indian boy. Frequent illustrations expand the text.

"Knowledge" books—the books of history, biography, travel—ought to be in every child's library. A good biography of this year's publication is "A Magician of Science," by John Winthrop Hammond (Century Co., $1.75), "the boys' life of Steinmetz." It is a fascinating record of achievement. Nothing better for boys has come to our notice than "A Boy's-eye View of the Arctic," by Kennett Rawson (Macmillan, $1.75), a book by a boy for other boys, for Kennett Rawson is the fourteen-year-old boy who went with Macmillan on his 1925 Arctic expedition. It is illustrated from photographs. A real story book based on history, by Lucy Fitch Perkins, also fetchingly illustrated by her, is "The American Twins of the Revolution" (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.75). It is for slightly younger readers than the two preceding books noted, and is one of the feature books issued for children this year.

We never pick up what we call a "treasure book," without thinking of the barrenness of the book-shelves of those little "token book" children of long ago. By a "treasure book" we mean one of those fat, running-over-with-pictures volumes of delightful miscellany such as the annual "Chatterbox" which the Page company of Boston ($1.75) gets out. The 1927 "Chatterbox" is a little bit the best of any yet. You'll say so when you see it. Another "treasure book" (such a joyous one!) for this year is "The Treasure Ship," prepared by no less a person than Lady Cynthia As-

From "Sully Joins the Circus," Century Co.

Nor should a child's life be without volumes of prose that can carry facts to worlds that make for him a new thing of life. Among the most attractive editions of this season are two published by Scribner's Sons of New York which should be in the library of every child over ten years old—"Hans quith (Scribner's, $2.50). It is a real treasure ship because it has aboard gems from such great writers as John Galsworthy, J. M. Barrie, Hilaire Belloc, Walter De La Mare and many others who have minds that are treasure mines. It has exquisite colored "tipped" pictures, and delightful black and whites.

Just Stories

BY SUSAN WILMOTT

"WHAT kind of books do you like best?" I asked a ten-year-old young niece.

"Oh, juth thories," was her illuminating reply.

I watched and discovered that "juth thories" were the realistic sort of tale that she could follow easily because it touched upon the familiar. This is a common preference among children. Such a book is "Joan Morse," by Eliza Orne White (Houghton Mifflin Co., $1.75), the story of a little girl who lives with her grandmother in New England and has the best of times with two kittens and a doll—and she also goes a-visiting.

A good story for boys twelve to fifteen is "The White Leader," by Constance Lindsay Skinner (Macmillan, $1.75)—good because it is a tale that deals with real adventure in a worthwhile cause. It is a story of the mountain pioneers of Kentucky and Tennessee following the War of the Revolution.

If they like a bit of mystery in their stories concerning hidden treasure and so on, then "The Secret of Tate's Beach," by Augusta Huiell Seaman (Century Co., $1.75) is the book for them. It is attractively printed and illustrated and will give its readers some thrilling hours.

"May and Marcia, Partners," by Helen Cady Forbes (Macmillan, $2) is a very real story, for girls of ten to thirteen, of May who had money and Marcia who had none—and together they make a "go" of it. When the story's finished, the reader will feel that he's been living in New England for awhile.

Perhaps it's the child who likes the plain, matter-of-fact tale who should be given stories that especially draw on the imagination, for a matter-of-fact person never can realize the joys of life as can one who has the imaginative faculty highly developed. "Children's Stories," by Evaleen Stein (Page, $1.65) makes the child find a personality in trees, animals and birds, and listen to the letters in the mailbag talking. Attractively illustrated. "Eliza and the Elves," by R. Rachel Field (Macmillan, $2) with its amusing illustrations by Elizabeth MacKinstry, would almost put imagination into a stone. The elfish poems and the story about elfland will give the child a great deal of valuable information about the fairy world! In these stories of the imagination we must mention one of the gems—a children's classic, in fact, "The Princess and the Goblin," by George MacDonald (Macmillan, $1.75). The publishers have planned it for children ten to twelve years of age—perhaps, only we find it hard to wrest it from some who are looking backward at their teens. Well-illustrated and attractive in get-up.

Books for "the Littlest Ones"

BY MARY A. ASHMORE

THERE is always a tender tug at the heart when one examines these books for the very little boys and girls, to whom the world is just opening up so surprisingly. There's one about a little boy, "Gordon," by Sara Cone Bryant, (Houghton Mifflin Co., $1) that will bring delightful "ohs" and "ahs"—the pictures are so understandable and the printing is so big and clear and the stories about Gordon's summer on a farm are so fascinating.

"Mr. Chick" is going to make many children happy in the months to come by "his travels and adventures," partly because he is so very interesting and partly because Lucy Fitch Perkins, who wrote these adventures, has made the loveliest sort of pictures that children will look at and look at and never tire of. (Houghton Mifflin Co., $2.)

"The Tale of the Good Cat Jupie," by Neely McCoy (Macmillan, $1.75), is another story with the most understandable colored, and also black-and-white, pictures, made by the author. Children of eight can read the tale for themselves and children of five will love having it read to them. Jupie lived in a little red house by the river, and it was very lonely in winter and then along came the little girl Jean—that's a hint as to the story.

"Gray Moon Tales," by Minnie Bell

Mitchell (Bobbs-Merrill)—don't they just sound like the kind of stories children would like to have read them, especially when it's a black mammy that's "a-tellin' ob de tales" And then there are always the lovely pictures to show just what it is that black mammy's "tellin' ob." The same publishers have another new book that little children will like. It is called "Skitter Cat and Little Boy," by Eleanor Youmans and has the most "speaking" pictures. It tells about a lovely Persian cat and about a mountain trip on which are met some animals not so well known as Skitter Cat.

Three New Books

REVIEWED BY RAYMOND SETTLE

The Beautiful Childhood, by E. Francis Boulting. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co. Illustrated.

A charming story of the first thirteen years of the life of Christ in which the customs, manners of the time and the surroundings in which he lived are carefully reproduced. It represents a decision on the part of the author to portray the early life of our Lord as that of a normal, healthy boy. The story closely follows the gospel narrative and a genuine spirit of reverence prevails. An excellent volume for use in home or school.

The Beauty of Strength, by Henry Howard. New York: Doran. $1.50.

A series of fifteen expository children's sermons on Ephesians 6:10-18. They are a distinct departure from the usual stock type of sermon with which children have been inflicted of late years. The author evidently believes, and rightly so, that the "children's portion" ought to consist of a goodly helping of the "meat of the Word." Some of the illustrations are hardly well taken, but on the whole the volume is well worth reading, either by children or by their pastor.

From "A Magician of Science, Century Co.

Forest Friends, by Hubert R. Evans. Philadelphia: Judson Press. Illustrated. $1.

Fifty-three stories of furred, feathered or finned creatures which make the homes west of the Rockies. They are well written by a man who knows what he writes. To a child who has become bored with the stereotyped, Un-Remus bed-time story this little volume will afford many happy hours. To a lover of the great out-of-doors, these stories will prove fascinating for they what the author has observed in the woods, beside the streams and in the mountains.

The Devotional Life

The Tactfulness of Love

"And this I pray, that your love may abound . . . in all judgment."— Philippians 1:9

By GEORGE H. MORRISON

THE word that is here used for judgment is an interesting word. It occurs nowhere else in the New Testament. Its primary signification was perception by any of the senses, but gradually it became specialized into perception by the sense of touch. And so, rising into higher spheres (for words have their own moral history), it came to mean what we describe as tact. Tact is the same word as touch. Tact is the kind of way in which we touch things. The difference is that what we touch now is not material like wood or stone. It is the unseen substance of which life is made, with its sensibilities and shrinkings, its strange and instantaneous reactions. Such contacts we are forced to make in every period of life. Our years are spent in ceaseless interaction with the lives of other people. And whenever we learn to touch these other lives delicately and understandingly, we possess the charming grace of tact.

The Blossoming of Love

It is notable that Paul connects this grace with the growth and deepening of love. When love abounds it inevitably blossoms into all kinds of delicate perception. These Philippians to whom he wrote seem, happily, to have been ignorant of heresy. But they were ready to misunderstand each other; there was much social bitterness in Philippi. The grace they lacked was that interior delicacy which would not hurt or irritate another, sometimes without ever meaning it. There are many people who mean well, yet are always rubbing others the wrong way. Often they are quite unconscious of it, and never dream of the hurt that they are causing. One can gather from this letter that in Philippi, for all its orthodoxy, there was a good deal of that social unpleasantness. Paul was perfectly aware of that. He had his hand on the pulse of all his churches. He saw how it spoiled the joy and peace and harmony that ought to reign and rule among the saints. And the notable thing is he does not waste his time in exhorting his children to a greater tactfulness; he prays that they may have a greater love. He goes down to the heart of things. He fixes his attention on the center. Let love have a controlling place, and the touch will become infinitely delicate. What to avoid, what not to say or do, is not a secret of the intellect; it is always a secret of the heart.

The Roughened Touch

This tactfulness of love is apparent in many different spheres. Watch a botanist handling a flower; you can tell that he loves it by the way he touches it. Look at a mother with her little baby; her very touch reveals the mother-heart. I can often tell if a young fellow loves books, not by the clever way in which he talks of them, but by the kind of way in which he handles them. Let a rough, coarse man love a woman, and it is amazing how tactful he becomes. He begins to define, by the genius of the heart, the delicate attentions she is longing for. For there are little actions of courtesy and grace that mean far more than any gold or silver to such as may be sensitively fashioned. It is always a sure mark that love is dying when tact takes to itself wings and flies away. When the delicate perceptions disappear, it is a token that the heart is hardening. And that is the tragedy of many lives, not the blighting touch of infidelity, but the roughened touch (so rough that it may hurt) which betrays the decadence of love.

A Spurious Tact

In its roots as well as in its fruits true tact differs from diplomacy. I venture to say that tact is always spurious when it is not rooted in the soil of love. There is a kind of tact that springs from fear, though no one ever may suspect its origin. It shuns offense, not for the sake of love, but because offending might prove perilous. The eye may be fixed, not on the other person, but on one's own quietness or prosperity, either of which may be endangered by the rough or ill-considered touch. True tact is different from that. It owns no kinship with cowardice. It is one of the finest flowerings of love; it is the exquisite perception of the heart. That is why Christian tact so far surpasses anything the world had ever known in any of the religions of antiquity. The gospel has done tremendous service in the education of the heart. Giving it at last a worthy motive, it has released the hidden capacities of loving, and so doing has poured a wealth of meaning, for common and undistinguished people, into the gracious tactfulness of love.

Fuller Love and Finer Tact

Nowhere do we find this tactfulness of love so perfectly revealed as in our Lord. The infinite delicacy of his touch is the measure of his loving heart. When the leper cried for healing we read that the Lord touched him; it was not alone his hand that touched him, it was a yearning and redeeming love. That lonely, isolated soul got far more than the cleansing of his leprosy; he got the glad assurance of a friend. Christ had an exquisite way of understanding people, of handling them with unexampled delicacy, of avoiding what might vex or irritate and so close the avenues against him. And all this sprang, not from a quick intellect, priding itself on knowing human nature, but from the depth and wonder of his love. That was where Paul learned his lesson. That taught him what to pray for. It was no use praying for a finer tact unless first there was a fuller love. First come the roots, and then the fruits. First, the deepening, and then the delicacy. First, the dew of heaven on the heart, and tactfulness blossoms as the rose.

The Chimney Corner

Have You a Book?

ONE big New York publisher of long experience estimates that only about 200,000 of the 24,000,000 American households buy books regularly; in other words, only about one out of each 120 American households considers books as necessary as breakfast foods, radio sets, chewing gum, or flivvers.

Ellis W. Myers, executive secretary of the American Booksellers' Association, informed that body recently: "The vast majority of the public does not buy books. In fact, I think the vast majority does not read."

Pondering these statistics, estimates and opinions, one is brought to question whether the current vaudeville story about the man who replied to the suggestion that he take a book as a present to his wife, "Oh, she has a book," belongs in the realm of fancy or in the realm of actual fact!

There is another story about the chorus girl who, several mornings after her wedding, finding her new husband reading the sporting page, cried in an anguished tone, "I've married a book-worm!"

In some of the outlying sections of the states which have few or no bookstores, we fear many a young bride would feel that her husband moved in some strange and remote realm if she found him reading anything at all.

Books last a long time. Even if few are bought each year, the general accumulations may be large. In 1924 the local libraries undertook to investigate the question of the ownership of books in the city of Cincinnati and the surrounding rural sections. School children were asked to report the total number of books in their homes. If the total number was less than fifteen, the titles were asked for. If there were no books at all in the home, this fact was reported. The proportion of answers received was comparatively small considering the large number of children asked to report. This fact might indicate that a great many homes had no books whatsoever.

Reports were received from 2662 families, about 2000 through the city branches and 600 through the rural schools. Statistics based upon these reports showed an average of 120 volumes per family for the entire county. But it must be understood that these statistics are based on the relatively small number of reports received. Six and one-half per cent of the total reports showed no books in the home; 16 per cent showed less than fifteen books; 63 per cent showed less than 100 books.

Before growing too enthusiastic about this relatively high showing, however, one must consider a number of related facts. Ohio in addition to being the breeding place for presidents is, of course, one of the wealthiest states. Figures taken in such a city as Cincinnati cannot, perhaps, be regarded as typical. Among the books listed, moreover, were appalling numbers of the works of Mary J. Holmes, Bertha M. Clay and Gene Stratton-Porter. There was an "amazing number of cook books." This fact causes us to digress sufficiently long to wonder why it is, in view of the prodigious number of cook books everywhere to be found, that Count Witte and so many other Europeans have complained that American food is "altogether unfit for human consumption."

A list of eight books possessed by one Cincinnati family consisted of the Bible, a dictionary, "David Copperfield" and five cook books!

A report of 200 books had "eighteen books on behavior such as how to overcome timidity, etc." Where, now, is the stalwart American freeman of the middle west?

Another report read: "Nine cyclopaedias, nine histories for reverence (sic) and topical reading, and fifty books and authors." This family obviously did not share Henry Ford's opinion that history is all bunk.

A list of nineteen titles included four hymn books, one sonatina album, "Oranges from Florida," "I'm from Missouri. You Can't Steer Me" and a cook book. A little girl who had recently come from Kentucky carefully explained that father had so many potatoes to bring that he had to leave the books!

The report of the investigation states that "objectionable books are conspicuous by their absence." This state of affairs may indicate either that the middle west is chemically pure or that father discreetly locks up his objectionable books. Your temperament will decide your opinion on the subject. "There was little scientific and technical material." What! Is the middle west not realistic and rationalistic? Meredith once claimed, "Your sentimentalist is the inevitable product of a fat soil." Does this insight into the mental life of Cincinnati and its environs endorse that epigram?

One hundred books per family might indicate the purchase of four books per year for twenty-five years. May Lamberton Becker, whose highly specialized literary work in answering questions concerning books on every sort of topic is well known to American libraries, bookstores, and women's clubs, has stated that in her opinion her most successful article, during a career of more than twenty years, was one suggesting the purchase of four books a year by the average intelligent American household.

Considering the fact that there are probably five million illiterate adults in the country and that most of the books sold are probably sold to less than half a million households, it is likely that the average American household does not yet purchase four books a year.

—JESSE LEE BENNETT in the Bookman

Who Was to Blame?

THE boy was standing before the judge of a juvenile court charged with a crime that had shocked the entire community and brought grief and misery to his parents.

"Where did you get the idea of committing such a deed?" asked the judge.

"I read it," replied the lad simply.

The judge hesitated a moment, then turned and addressed the boy's father: "Did you ever take the pains to examine the literature your boy was reading?"

"Why-er, no—that is, it never occurred to me," responded the man, cut to the quick by such a question.

Who was to blame?

Do you—teacher, mother, father—realize the tremendous influence on character building which is represented by the literature which is falling into the hands of your boys and girls?

Are you seriously and sympathetically trying to guide your boys and girls toward literature which you are certain will create clean and healthy attitudes?

Don't ever put yourself in the position of the father who had to acknowledge that such matters had never occurred to him.

BOYS and Girls

Friends on the Shelf

PETER and Polly had Moved to a new town.
 They did not know
 a single soul.
 And nobody knew them!
 So they were very lonely.
 They helped their mother unpack.
 They helped their mother settle:
 They put chairs here
 and chairs there.
 They put tables here
 and tables there.
 They hung pictures here
 and pictures there.
 They put books here
 on a shelf,
 and books there
 on a shelf.
 Until every single thing
 was in place, and it was like the other house
 in the other city.
 But yet not quite, for Polly said: "We now have no friends.
 And in the other city
 we had lots of them."
 She sighed.
 Peter sighed.
 And it was November—
 No sun! No stars! No moon! No friends!
 November!!
 Exactly at midnight
 there was a curious sound in that house.
 David Copperfield nudged over Twist, and he in turn nudged little Dorrit.
 Three of them put their heads together: "How necessary for
 Peter and Polly to sigh
 when we are here!"
 And they arranged a surprise. A Plot!
 Quite without knowing that a Plot (with a big P) was about to be hatched, some little women went over the lilacs only to find Hans Brinker and the skating skates. "What are we do with these lonely children?" they asked. And they too
 arranged a surprise.
 Robinson Crusoe
 had taken some recent traveler's travels on a treasure island containing many exciting Arabian

Nights had an Idea, too, and told
 His man Friday all
 About it, to Friday's Great delight. "I have Great expectations, sir,"
 He said, for pride and Prejudice had made
 Him the autocrat of
 The breakfast
 Table. "That is as you
 Like it then," said
 Robinson Crusoe, the pirate,
 And laid the Talisman on top
 Of the bow of Orange ribbon which
 The water babies always Wore. Of these babies
 The child Harold
 Had once been kidnapped
 By all sorts and Conditions of men, so he,
 Of course, refused to be Drawn into the Plot: "I Prefer to stay quietly by the Cloister and the hearth,"
 He said. But the other Baby cried: "Let me be the Spy, for I am the last of the Mohicans and I am so Tired of this bleak house
 I shall be glad to help
 The black dwarf slide down
 The lightning conductor
 Into the promised land,
 For he's our mutual friend
 And both sense and sensibility
 Tell me to give him measure

For measure in these hard Times!"
 Whereupon both of Helen's
 Babies fell into a midsummer Night's dream; while They dreamed their eyes got Terribly pricked beside
 The bonnie brier bush in
 The days
 Of auld lang syne,
 And the boy baby lost
 The Pickwick papers,
 While the girl baby
 Was made an Egyptian princess
 So that her part
 In the Plot
 Was not of much use
 To anybody in Particular—for the Princess who sits in the seat
 Of the mighty dwells far
 From the maddening crowd, of Course!
 Now all this time
 Peter and Polly
 Were asleep in bed,
 Without realizing that
 The light that Failed had left Their house very Dark, but the Plot
 Went merrily on Downstairs, just
 As plots used to do
 When we were very Young, you and I!
 Suddenly there was a
 Terrific crash!
 Bang! Bang! Bang!
 Bang!!

Explorers—Attention!!

Dear Boys and Girls,

I have had lots of fun working the titles of well-known books into this dream of "Friends on the Shelf," in order that you may have just as much fun discovering the titles of these would-be friends! So will you not take pencil and paper, write a series of numbers in a column, then opposite the numbers list in their proper order the titles of the books you can discover?
 And then, to add spice to the search, please explore further (either inside your own head, or on your library shelves) in order to write the author's name opposite the title of each book. When your list is made, mail it to Miss Margaret T. Applegarth, 14 Arnold Park, Rochester, N. Y., and something nice will happen to the best guessers!

Said Peter: "Something
 Has broken through the Looking-glass, I'm afraid!"
 Said Polly: "It sounds
 As if the marble faun
 Had smashed into a Thousand pieces!"
 So they both jumped
 Out of bed
 And scampered downstairs,
 Into the blackness.
 They struck a match,
 And there, on the floor,
 Face-downward,
 Lay every single book
 Which had entered
 Into the Plot!!
 "What a misfortune!" cried Polly,
 Who realized she would Have to put them back!
 "What a comedy of errors!" cried Peter,
 Who realized there was
 More in this than met the eye!
 And then they began
 To listen.
 The books rustled their Leaves "I hear

Young People and the Kingdom

CONDUCTED BY EDWIN PHELPS, GENERAL SECRETARY, B. Y. P. U. OF A.

"Meeting Helps" on Devotional Topic for Nov. 21

THE THANKFUL HEART

(Note: These "helps" are built around the material given in "Young People's Leader," the official magazine "For All Young People." Subscription to the "Leader" may be made through the B.Y.P.U. of America at $1 per year.)

Read over the material given in the Leader, then put down for your own information the names of the most popular persons in your acquaintance. See whether or not these persons express their thanks. Write opposite their names the form their appreciation takes, as for example, one person may express his thanks by helping others.

In meeting you may tell the story of the scripture lesson and bring in the thoughts expressed in the Leader. Ask the young people to think about the most popular people in their acquaintance, and see if these are not the ones who express their thanks. Tell also of your own experiment with popular persons, mentioning no names.

As the Leader suggests, this is a family day. Most of you are familiar with the thought that "home is where we vent our wrath." One of the results of this meeting should be the desire of every person present to make his family or home life the sweetest; to give expression to his thanks for what is done in the home. And since the church is also a home—God's house—it might be well to determine to express appreciation for what God has done by doing whatever we can, large or small, to help the kingdom cause.

If you have not already had "Home-coming" in your young people's society, this might be a good time to have it. If you care to decorate the room, autumn leaves, cornstalks, pumpkins, fruit, etc., could be placed around the meeting room. Perhaps light refreshments could be prepared and served before the meeting, thus the young people could become better acquainted. The singing of old songs, both secular and sacred, would help the occasion. A number of young people could quietly greet any strangers who might attend and introduce them to the other young people.

The meeting itself could be informal, with the people grouped about the room in a circle. The leader could be seated with the group rather than at a table in front of it. The songs might be suggested by those within the circle. The topic presentation, while it should be clear and to the point, should be a heart-to-heart talk, bringing out the points suggested above. Perhaps those in the meeting could tell of their experiences with the thankful heart of others, or in their own lives. The meeting should end with a quiet prayer of thanksgiving.

A Practical Outcome

Many of you remember the student conference held last December in Evans-ton. You will remember that one of the questions raised by these students concerned the foreign student in America.

In September there was held in Princeton, N. J., a conference to study the relationship of foreign students to the Christian church and its missionary enterprise. There were ninety-three students present, representing twenty-three colleges in fourteen states and sixteen denominations. Thirty-eight of this number were foreigners—Chinese, Indian, Japanese, Korean, and Philippino.

After the unity of purpose of those present had been stressed, and something of the cultural background and heritage of the nations represented, the students grouped themselves according to nationality, believing that they could best express for themselves what was involved in Christianizing their own nation. "It is significant that the reports from these groups were remarkably similar. Unanimously they agreed that there must be a progressive dimming of denominational lines until a real spiritual unity obtains. They were further agreed that Christianity can best be interpreted to a country by its own people, and that the mission agencies must recognize more and more the necessity for an increasing degree of control in the mission work by the nationals—even to the control of funds. The group commended the mission boards whose policy left the return of missionaries after their first furlough to the option of the people with whom they had been working. Some of the Oriental groups suggested that the West must come to a more sympathetic understanding of other cultures and other religions than its own, and recognize their great contributions to human progress. Another group suggested an international center for missionary activity in order to denationalize and internationalize all missionary thereby avoiding superiority complex. The American group felt that much work must be done in developing interracial amity before the nation could be spoken of as being in harmony with the principles of Jesus. All groups emphasized the great need of personal religion and individual consecration."

The program of the missionary enterprise was traced briefly and its future trend outlined. The students were shown that most of the missionary agencies have already adopted programs much advanced in policy, and that many of the policies favored by the conference are already in operation on the mission fields in some places. The problems now facing mission boards were outlined: denominationalism; revolution; relation of missionary coworker to national Christian leader; financing mission campaign on its new basis (much aversion voiced by the conference to financial appeals on an unbalanced presentation of conditions on mission field); education in other cultures and religions; making Christianity indigenous; restating policies of educational and medical missions; the standard of living of the missionary (in the discussion of this point the group concluded that the difference in the standard of living between missionary and the people whom he serves is of less importance than his attitude toward them); the future need for international cooperation; recruiting qualifications of the new missionary.

The group felt the need of able men with specialized training who would serve for short terms abroad. It explored the tendency of some agencies to estimate results by mere statistics. In discussing the qualifications, the students listed the following: a deep personal experience of the Christ he strives to share; willingness to play "second fiddle"; to work with, not for, the national; teachableness; sympathy with country which he goes; cheerful temperament; refinement, culture, and education; good standing character and personality; good health; broadmindedness; a sense of justice; an understanding of, and conviction about, the major social, economic and political problems; tact.

The conference passed no formal resolutions and adopted no official findings; hence the suggestions listed are those which came out during the course of the meeting.

Churches at Work

If your church has developed interesting and effective methods of carrying on its work, we shall be glad to have an opportunity of telling other churches about them through the medium of this page. Material should be addressed to the Board of Missionary Cooperation, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City

INTEREST IN

STEWARDSHIP ESSAYS

Directors of religious education in a number of states are actively interesting themselves in the stewardship essay contest for the current year. Everything points to a marked increase in the number of contestants for the prizes that are offered to young people. Essays may be sent in at any time after Nov. 15 prior to Feb. 15, the closing date of the contest. Your state office or the Board of Missionary Cooperation will give full information.

GOOD WORK

Under the leadership of Rev. H. B. Fox, First church, Benton, Ill., has paid $4,000 during the last fourteen months of indebtedness on its new building. All local expenses are paid to date. The Baptist church at Rantoul, Ill., Rev. W. Patterson, pastor, had seven delegates and eleven visitors who drove a distance of two hundred and sixteen miles to attend the Alton Assembly this year.

THE SUBURBAN PROBLEM

In speaking of the suburban problem, William Reid of Rhode Island said: "We have been told that there are more than 8000 suburban communities adjacent to the great cities of our land and that these 8000 communities comprise more than 15 per cent of the population of the United States. The state conventions are responsible for thousands of suburbs near 125 cities of 50,000 to 100,000 population. There are three states in our territory that have seventeen cities of 100,000 to 500,000 population, all of which have from two to seventeen great suburban centers with little or no provision for the religious life of the children and young people who dwell in these centers." Doctor Reid observed that in a New England town every child and 80 per cent of the officers of the Baptist church were not living in the town where the church was located but in suburbs from five to fifteen miles away—a not uncommon condition.

CHURCHES THAT GET

CONVENTION AID

"I recently made a study of Kansas," said J. T. Crawford reporting on convention work for the aid of churches, and found from our records that eleven of twelve best churches were planted through missionary effort and received denominational aid. In the next fifty, thirty-five were helped. Kansas is in the middle of this continent, not out West, and doubtless what has been done in Kansas has been done in other places. We recognize that there are still great opportunities to aid a church in its planting and in the maintenance of its pastor through a struggling period so that it may become efficient in denominational work." H. Q. Morton says that he has been in Nebraska for seven months and has discovered over forty pastorless churches of which thirty-five may never have a pastor again unless they are helped by the convention.

WILL JOURNEY THROUGH

THE WEST

Dr. James Whitcomb Brougner, president of the Northern Baptist Convention, and Dr. W. H. Bowler, executive secretary of the Board of Missionary Cooperation, will make an autumn journey together from Chicago to the Pacific coast. En route they will meet state Baptist leaders in a succession of conferences called to discuss denominational work in its widest aspect, the evangelistic campaign, the missionary program and plans for the coming year. Doctor Bowler has attended a number of state conventions and found them exceptional both in attendance and interest. West Virginia, for example, had an attendance that set a new record for that state. The conventions have been remarkable for the hearty and unanimous support given to the cooperative plans for the year.

PACE-SETTERS

One Sunday, some time ago, 100 men on fifty teams of two each went on their appointed rounds for the every-member canvass of the Fifth Avenue church, Huntington, W. Va., Dr. M. L. Wood, pastor. The budget called for almost an even $36,000. The pastor reported that a bit over the denominational quota for world missions was subscribed and that while every dollar for current expense was not on the dotted line, there was no cause for concern and that his people were rejoicing in the results obtained; that the current fund needs, by a follow-up, were assured of being met. This church, by the way, had $1960 in the special Easter bank offering last spring.

The Broadway church, Providence, R. I., recently held a successful every-member canvass. Approximately 300 new pledges were secured which increased the missions budget of the church by $3500 and that for local expenses by $3000. The entire budget for the year was practically underwritten by the canvass.

HAVE YOU A TICKET?

All those who are going to circle the globe in the airship "Evangel" should be completing their preparations, for January is not far distant. It is only necessary to give your name to the tour committee of your church and you will receive a ticket. Book now!

CROWDED OUT

The congregations at Glassell Avenue church, Los Angeles, are increasing steadily. An interesting feature is that the building is not large enough to accommodate the number of children who wish to attend Sunday school. There is one boy's class which is forced, because of lack of room, to meet in an automobile, placed beside the church.

A NOVEL CHALLENGE

A member of the Baptist church at Whittier, Calif., has offered a new $15,000 pipe organ to the church on condition that the rest of the members raise the $19,000 debt on the new church building. The church has unanimously voted to meet this challenge. October is the time set to raise the $19,000 and at the same time the current expense and missionary budget will be subscribed.

A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION

The church at Grinnell, Iowa, is working out a five-year program of advancement. It was decided in July that the first step in the program should be to free the church entirely of debt. The last Sunday in November was set as the final day for the raising of the money. The last note on the parsonage of the Seaview church has been paid, and on Aug. 26 Seaview Baptists gathered to watch the treasurer burn the note.

A RED-LETTER DAY

Sunday, Oct. 10, proved to be a "red-letter day" for the Baptist church, Lake City, Iowa, Rev. Harry Throckmorton, pastor. The congregation was told of the struggles of the church to keep out of the debt column and of how the trustees had labored to find a way to erase all obligations. It was announced that at a meeting of the young folk of the church, it was decided to take over a debt of $330, and the young people succeeded in raising this amount. At a meeting of the ladies' aid, the women made a decision to construct a mile of pennies. With the mile of pennies indebtedness of eight hundred dollars was wiped out. These announcements were followed by the burning of the note which indicated that all debts had been cleared.

Among Ourselves

Letter from India

By W. L. FERGUSON

THESE are stirring days in India for the general and provincial elections are drawing on apace. The country has not yet come to a sharp and clear alignment of parties such as obtains in England and America for democracy is a new thing in Oriental government; therefore there is much floundering among legislators, politicians and would-be statesmen in their efforts to form and establish a party system. The chief obstacle in the way of such formation is that there are too many who desire to lead and too few who wish to follow. The result is that new parties are being born rapidly. These live for a little while and then disintegrate and pass away. At present the break-up of the Swarajists as represented by Mr. Gandhi in his most popular days is apparent. One would have to seek far to find any one of prominence who stands for the program of the great leader of five years ago. Gandhi-ism is dead, and Gandhi is deserted as a political leader. None has arisen to take his place, for there is none other with his picturesqueness and power of appeal to the masses as well as to the classes and the bosses. As matters now stand the chances seem to favor a party which will adopt a policy of co-operation with the government both in the provinces and in the central legislative assembly. It is becoming clear that a merely negative and obstructive attitude has been all but fruitless, and that if in 1929 when the review of India's progress in self-government takes place a further instalment of power is desired, the only way to obtain it is to fall in and do constructive work. The party which will do this, however, is not yet fully fledged, but signs of its formation are evident. Meantime there is much confusion and shifting from one political group to another, and the groups are small and many.

Riots Still Frequent

Communal riots are still frequent. It seems a bit monotonous to a scribe for THE BAPTIST to report these month after month, and so no mention has been made of several sizeable conflicts which have taken place, most of them in large cities and populous centers. Almost always there is some loss of life and invariably numbers are injured. Each conflict, instead of settling anything, makes matters worse. Whereunto this will grow one cannot foresee further than to say that Hindu-Muslim unity is impossible as long as religio-political animosities exist in these acute forms.

The Mohammedans in India are exercised over the question of the khila-fat. As long as Turkey was unmodernized and had a sultan in Constantinople, as in pre-war days, the followers of Islam in India were content. There was a titular head for the religion and some one, theoretically at least, to guard the holy places of the faith. Now there is no one; and the bitterness of the situation is that not Christians but Muslims have been the destroyers of the old headships, and that outside of India there seems to be little interest in having it restored. Turkey does not want a khalifa; Egypt is afraid to have one; Persia does not aspire to have the shah assume the office and honor; and Afghanistan seems indifferent so far as its ruler is concerned. Ibn Saud, the Wahabi, is sultan of Nejd and king of the Hedjaz. He is the most likely one to assume the title and exercise the power for he is rapidly becoming the master of Arabia, holding the holy places in his grasp, and able by military strength to keep them. Loud are the complaints in India concerning the vandalism which he has permitted at Mecca and Medina, and deep is the resentment of the hardships which pilgrims to these shrines experience. Many protest meetings have been held, especially in northern India where Muslims are most numerous, in expression of Mussalman grievances. An attempt is being made to hold a conference of leading Muslims of India to see whether some definite plan cannot be evolved for creating a new khilafat, one having headquarters in the Hedjaz, which might be made a free republic with an elected president, who as khalifa would be responsive because responsible to those who had elected him. Since the Sunnis and the Shiahhs greatly outnumber the Wahabis, a scheme of this sort providing for an elected head of Islam would easily oust Ibn Saud and his followers. That is the theory; but the practical part is that the Wahabis are in strong possession. Who is going to make war against them and put them out? The Indian Mussalmans have not the power to do it; and as yet there are no signs of a Pan-Islamic movement which has the cohesion and sinews needed for the task, for Turkey, Egypt, Afghanistan, Persia are each going a separate way toward the goal of nationhood and show no signs of getting together on the subject of the khilafat. And there the matter hangs.

Religious Endowments Bill

Frequently India or certain parts thereof is put into violent agitation owing to various proposed legislations. Madras has been going through such a period over the religious endowments bill. This has twice been before the local legislature and each time has encountered fierce opposition. Its scope and intent are to regulate the administration of Hindu temples and religious foundations established for charitable and other purposes. Vested interests, wherever touched, become alarmed at the prospect of reform legislation; and those who see a chance for making inroads against hoary customs to their own advantage are not slow to become radicals and oppose the vested interests. There were 475 amendments to the bill offered during the twenty-days' discussion of its merits. Finally, however, the bill was passed and it has gone to the governor and to the governor-general for approval.

A number of non-official members of the legislative assembly are said to have written to the finance member of the government of India regarding the high cost of running a motor-car in this land, comparing or contrasting it with the costs in other regions of the earth. On a car costing about $1200, they say, the annual taxes amount to $200, whereas in England a car of this type would go off with about $65. Taxes are numerous to be sure. First, there is import duty on the car and all "spares"; next comes a registration fee; then follow license fees every half year, drivers' license toll-gate fees and a tax on each gallon of gasoline used. When the score is complete, the figures are near the luxury column; but the motor-car is fast displacing carriages and horses, rickshaws and carts and other means of travel beside the railway. It is a necessity and ought not to be regarded otherwise. There is a movement afoot to cheapen the cost of operation.

The New Andhra University

Aug. 30 the new Andhra university was formally opened by the governor of Madras at Bezwada. The new institution, which is in the heart of the Telugu area, starts off well. One ruler, the maharaja of Bobbili, who is pro-chancellor, has contributed Rs. 100,000 to the funds of the university; another has contributed a library worth twice that amount. It is hoped to use the Telugu language as a medium of instruction much more than has been the custom heretofore in the University of Madras, Andhra now being separated from the control of the old seat of learning in which English has been all but universally used for teaching in other than elementary schools.

The high cost of missions is a theme to dilate upon these days. The financial and currency commission which has been investigating on behalf of the government regarding the best methods of stabilizing moneys and exchange has reported in favor of fixing the rupee at a shilling and six pence. This means for American missions a loss of $11 every $100 sold. The old par value was Rs. 308 to each $100. This new rating will fix it at about Rs. 275. In order to overcome this adverse ratio there is "screaming need for pecuniary lifting" among Baptists and others having missions in India.

Now comes a man advertising a talisman, by which, if one will purchase it and wear it about his neck, he will be delivered from all troubles, law-suits, diseases, financial difficulties and early decrepitude. It will ward off lightning from churches, temples and mosques, and will ensure success in civil service and other examinations. It will make its possessor sweet-tempered, happy and rich. Its price is fifty cents, but I am not attracted by the offer for it seems to me we should need several thousand gross in order to accomplish the re-making of our Baptist world. This being so, we plod on in the same old way.

The West Virginia State Convention

BY CLARENCE W. KEMPER

THIS convention met for its sixty-second annual session in the new Baptist Temple buildings of Charleston. The five Baptist churches of the city joined in its entertainment. From many standpoints this was considered the best meeting in the convention's history. The five Temple buildings furnished ideal quarters and diversity of program attracted people of different interests. The total attendance exceeded 1000 and the evening sessions averaged 800 people.

A feature of the convention was the music provided by the choirs of the Charleston churches for the evening sessions. The Temple choir, under the direction of Louis A. Potter, gave a program Wednesday evening marking the dedication of the Temple pipe organ to the state pioneer Baptist leaders of yesterday.

Conferences for children's work, young people's work, adult and administrative work and stewardships occupied the various afternoon sessions. The last afternoon the convention went by motor to visit the five Baptist church buildings of Charleston. This city houses its five churches in modern buildings worth one million dollars. It was a good demonstration of modern equipment for a city of 65,000 population. The last evening play, "The High Calling," given at Washington, was presented by members of the Baptist Temple. At the conclusion of this play an appropriate coronation message was brought by Charles Henry Pinchbeck, pastor of First church, Parkersburg.

The convention, following precedent, elected a layman, Prof. W. W. Trent of Charleston, as president, and Mrs. S. Glasscock of Morgantown as first vice-president.

At the noon hour expository messages were brought by Vernon L. Schontz, Gabriel Maguire, W. E. Abrams and Walter S. Dunlap. Doctor Kelley and state workers presented a rich program Tuesday evening demonstrating the different types of work carried on within the state. Thursday evening Gov. Howard M. Gore of West Virginia entertained the convention in the governor's mansion. Since this included local Baptists, more than 2,000 guests were present.

The convention had several prominent denominational leaders as speakers such as J. H. Franklin, W. H. Bowler, F. W. Padelford, Frank A. Smith, David Lee Jamison, W. C. Taylor, Robert L. Kelley, Miss Alma Noble and Miss Janet McKay. They brought inspiration to the convention.

The convention was characterized by wide participation on the part of pastors and laymen from city and country. The program of the denomination for evangelism had right of way. Secy. A. S. Kelley and his organization are to be congratulated on the high level to which the convention came. The local pastors and churches, consisting of the Baptist Temple, Clarence W. Kemper; Calvary, Charles H. Harrington; Emmanuel, James F. Frame; South Charleston, Earl L. Grose; and Mt. Calvary, H. A. Jackson, heartily cooperated in the entertainment of the convention.

New Hampshire Anniversaries

BY WINFIELD G. HUBBARD

THE New Hampshire Baptist Convention held its first meeting as an incorporated body June 27, 1826, in New London at the home of Joseph Colby whose son, Anthony, was the father of Mrs. James Colgate. (These are well-known names in the history of Colgate university, Hamilton, N. Y., and Colby academy, New London, N. H.) Sixteen churches were represented at that convention.

October 4-6, representatives from the 145 churches which now make up the convention met at New London to celebrate its centennial. C. W. Tobey presided at the convention sessions and W. C. Meyers at the meetings of the ministers' conference. J. K. Romeyn, pastor at New London, gave the address of welcome. The annual sermon was preached by J. L. Clark of Exeter on "Christ Magnified" (Philippians 1:20). Winfield G. Hubbard of Meriden gave the centennial address.

An outdoor service was held at the Colby homestead. At this time addresses were given by C. W. Tobey, convention president; by Daniel S. Jenks, secretary; and by Miss Mary E. Colgate, daughter of Mrs. Susan F. (Colby) Colgate. A. J. Archibald offered the centennial prayer after which the members of the convention visited the room where the meeting was held 100 years ago. Out-of-state speakers included: E. C. Herrick, president of Newton; J. C. Robbins; Floyd H. Adams; Prof. John M. English; J. C. Massee; Charles L. White; F. W. Padelford; W. H. Main; H. I. Marshall, president of the Kaven Theological seminary, Burma; A. W. Cleaves; and Mrs. Orin R. Judd who represented the Baptist women's missionary work.

The general banquet Monday evening and the separate banquets for men and women Tuesday evening were enjoyable. Reports were given by Lewis E. Staples, treasurer; by D. S. Jenks, secretary; by Miss Ella B. Weaver, director of young people's work. H. L. Sawyer, headmaster of Colby academy, gave an address at the laymen's banquet. The Temple quartet sang several times during the sessions; George Philbrick was soloist. The next session of the convention will be held at Portsmouth.

Centenary Michigan (Detroit) Association

BY ALBERT H. FINN

BAPTIST beginnings in Michigan were reviewed at Detroit during the 100th anniversary of the organization of the Michigan Baptist Association now known as the Detroit Baptist Association. The association was entertained by First church, Oct. 6-8.

The Michigan Association was the first effort made in Michigan in territorial days to cooperate as churches in kingdom advancement. There were four existing churches in the territory—Pontiac, Stoney Creek, Troy and Farmington—when a call went out to gather in Pontiac early in 1827 to organize an association. Rev. Elon Galusha was the first resident Baptist clergyman, having been sent as a missionary into the territory by the New York Domestic Missionary Society. Rev. Elkanah Comstock later came from New York to become pastor of the Pontiac church and led in the organization of the association. Detroit at that time had no duly organized church, but First church was organized later in the same year, 1827. Of the four organized churches, Pontiac still remains vigorous but is now a member of the Wayne Association. Stoney Creek and Troy have gone out of existence and Farmington is the lone member of the original association. In September that old, but reborn, church celebrated its centennial with two days of addresses and rejoicing.

The centenary program opened Wednesday evening with C. J. Netting, president of the Detroit Baptist Union, chairman. Ralph Calder gave an organ recital followed by a devotional service conducted by Rev. W. G. Colman at which Mrs. H. H. Bingham sang. Dr. Mark F. Sanborn, pastor of First church and moderator of the association, gave an address on the "Scope of the Centennial Celebration." Following this came a pageant, "Highways of Faith," illustrating various phases of Baptist development during the century, prepared and directed by Mrs. B. T. Leonard and supported by the chorus choir of First church. The descriptive reading was done by Rev. A. V. Allen; closing prayer, by Rev. W. W. McMaster. Although the weather was unpropitious the great church was crowded with loyal Baptists.

Thursday morning Doctor Sanborn, moderator, called the association to order. After a devotional period led by E. W. Palmer the usual business was transacted, committees appointed, and the centenary program taken up. The first address was by Albert H. Finn who covered "The First Fifty Years," reciting interesting facts concerning this early formative period of Baptist work in Detroit and Michigan. He was followed by Mrs. Edward Wilson who gave a comprehensive resume of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Rev. Geo. L. Wittet followed with engaging reminiscences of the last quarter of the century. The centenary sermon was delivered by Rev. J. W. Hoag, pastor of the Woodard Avenue church. He spoke appreciatively of the heroes and heroines of the past but emphasized the hindrances and difficulties of kingdom advancement in these days, declaring that progress only came through great cost and sacrifice. The closing prayer was offered by Rev. George W. Johnson.

During the noon hour the women's missionary union gathered around the dining tables to hold its interesting meeting.

Outstanding Laymen

Rev. Albert G. Johnson presided at the afternoon session which opened with a devotional service led by Mrs. Herman Lang. The centenary program was again taken up with an address by Rev. E. Bond Griffith on "Ministers of the Past." He did not attempt to go back of his own memory and acquaintance but with one exception referred only to those who have gone before. T. T. Leete, Jr., covered the whole century in his review of "Outstanding Laymen." It was bright galaxy in which only two of the living were mentioned. A valuable paper on the "Development of Women's Work" was given by Miss Florence E. Grant. "Religious Education in the Making" was discussed from two angles by Rev. A. V. Allen and Rev. B. T. Leonard, the first treating of the historical constructive element and the second telling of present tendencies and future probabilities of development. E. Elmer Staub followed with the history and development of the Baptist Children's Home, the newest denominational enterprise, and the need for the new building, a campaign to raise $50,000 for this institution being on now.

The evening service was presided over by Judge Pliny W. Marsh. The organ recital was given by Mrs. Bertha Freeman and the devotional period was led by Rev. B. F. McAllister. The feature of the evening program was a chorus from the combined choirs of the Baptist churches, under the direction of Lloyd Holtz. They sang with power "Send Out Thy Light," by Gounod and "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem," by Maunder. Rev. M. C. Pearson as executive secretary brought the greetings of the Detroit Council of Churches in cordial and appreciative address. The address of the evening was by Rev. Allen Hoben on "Baptists and Social Progress." He was pastor of First church, 1904-1909, and so it was much like coming home for him. As president of Kalamazoo college he is closely identified with our denominational life in Michigan. This address was an able one and in it he took no particular credit to Baptists as a denomination. "We have only kept pace with the social consciousness with other leading Protestant denominations but we have had men in our communion that have been real leaders," but gave deserving tribute to Dr. C. R. Henderson, Dr. Walter Rauchenbusch, Doctor Batten, Dr. H. C. Vedder, Dr. Albion W. Small, also Dr. Shailer Mathews, as outstanding leaders in the interpretation of the ethics of Jesus Christ. His concluding thought was: "If we can be of no class, but of all, inter-national, inter-racial and Christlike, we may indeed help the world in the next great step of social progress that leads toward the brotherhood of man."

Friday morning William Moore, a leading layman, presided. The devotional period was led by Rev. R. L. Bradby, pastor of Second church, negro. This old church was organized in 1836 and today is the largest Baptist church in the state. The first paper of the morning was "The Negro in Detroit," given by Rev. A. H. Pace, superintendent of the advisory council for negro work. It was a fine historical statement. Dr. H. C. Gleiss, general superintendent of the Detroit Baptist Union, gave a review of the organization forty-eight years ago of the union, following its varied experiences and developments to 1916 when he came to the leadership and then abruptly left the story he was so deeply concerned with the past ten years, declaring that these later years are of common knowledge. An interesting presentation of "Work Among Our New Americans," by Rev. Frank Kaiser, was supplemented by brief statements from pastors from the various nationalistic groups with whom we Baptists have implanted a successful work: German, Rev. B. Graf; Swedish, Rev. O. W. Johnson; Polish, Rev. Jos. Rzepecki; Roumanian, Rev. C. R. Igrisan; Russian, Rev. N. Nesdoly; Czecho-Slovak, Rev. John Fort; Hungarian, Rev. N. Dulitz; Serbian, Rev. T. M. Tepsich; Mexican, Rev. W. G. Birch; a student who is temporarily with our Italian mission also asked to speak for his people.

During the noon hour various groups met about the dining tables, the most important being the board of trustees of the Detroit Baptist Union. This was the regular monthly meeting and reports from the several departments were read and important steps taken in the various building projects now pressing for consummation.

Rev. T. J. Edwards presided at the afternoon session. The devotional period was conducted by Rev. Geo. E. Bernard. The first address of the session was a world-wide survey given by Rev. Jos. C. Robbins of New York, foreign secretary American Baptist Eoreign Missionary Society. He was followed by Rev. John E. Smith, of Lansing, executive secretary of the Michigan Baptist Convention, on "The Home Base."

Election of Officers

Doctor Sanborn presided at the concluding session of the association which included reports, election of officers, etc. Rev. W. G. Coltman, pastor of the Highland Park church, was elected moderator; Rev. H. P. Klyver, vice-moderator; Rev. E. W. Palmer, clerk; and C. J. Netting, Jr., treasurer. The association will be entertained by the Farmington church next year.

The evening session was the concluding meeting of the centenary. Robert Manogg, president of the Detroit city B. Y. P. U., presided. Herbert Koppin gave an organ recital and the great chorus, directed by Lloyd Holtz, sang "Sanctus," by Gounod and "Ye Shall Dwell in the Land," by Stainer. It was wonderful music and presages the organization of a great Baptist choir for future occasions.

The devotional period was led by Rev. Calvin F. Hamilton. The first address of this young people's session was given by Earl Batty, past president of the Detroit city B. Y. P. U. and president of the Michigan B. Y. P. U. His theme "Our Baptist Young People," was a historical sketch of thirty-five years of remarkable history and a look into the future. Following came the address of the evening by Dr. Wm. Gear Spencer, president of the Michigan Baptist Convention and also of Hillsdale college, on "Look Ahead." Doctor Spencer is deservedly popular with Baptist young people. He said he desired to take his audience through three cemeteries, the black, the gray and the white, and from the scriptures read "tombstone records of Absalom, Jezebel and Judas in the black cemetery, several records in the Old Testament where the persons named only lived and died, in the gray and the turning to Hebrews II he read the epitaphs in the white. Then he made his "observations," pointing to Jesus as the only example in our "Look Ahead." It was a fitting climax to a great event.

The proceedings and messages of the centenary will be published in book form that its spirit and inspiration may carry on to future generations.

There was an exhibit of historic book pamphlets, denominational publication pictures and other relics. This was separate from the Baptist collection at the public library and beyond the knowledge of most of our Baptist constituency but they are coming to know of it and have been encouraged to augment it.

The centenary has greatly strengthened Baptist solidarity and its proceedings have informed the public of Baptist history and achievements. The centenary committee was composed of C. Netting, Sr., chairman; Mrs. Herman Lang, vice-chairman; Albert H. Finn, secretary; E. E. Staub, treasurer; H. C. Gleiss, superintendent; and M. F. Sanborn; Mangus Burgess; Ralph Caldwell; Mrs. T. T. Leete, Jr.; Mrs. B. T. Leonard; W. P. Lovett; Dr. W. F. Northrup.

Colorado State Convention

BY WALTER I. FOWLE

THE thirty-eighth annual convention of Colorado Baptists was held in the new building of First church, Boulder, Oct. 18-21. A spirit of genuine hospitality and fraternal love prevailed throughout the sessions.

The pastors' conference convened, Oct. 19, at nine a. m. Walter I. Fowle led in the church program conference and with the aid of Revs. Eden, Atkinson and Hall discussed the elements vital for the program of an aggressive church today. This topic was continued in the afternoon session when Jay J. Cook, new pastor at Ft. Collins, considered the question of the prayer meeting. Pres. C. Arlin Heydon, First church, Pueblo, stressed the need of definite goals as aids to progress. Franklin Fenner was elected president; C. M. Benight, Pueblo, secretary.

Dr. J. C. Massee, Tremont Temple, Boston, addressed the conference on "Methods in Evangelism" and the convention on "Our Present Evangelistic Emphasis as Baptists." The fire, energy and appeal of his talks will long remain. He emphasized the need of pastoral and personal evangelism but declared that there is no substitute for passionate public preaching.

Dr. S. G. Neil and Dr. George T. White brought earnest messages from the denomination at large. We have seldom heard a more sincere appeal for the M. and M. Benefit Board than that by Doctor White.

Attendance at the women's meetings was the largest ever recorded, and the reports of achievements through the state and associational organizations, encouraging. Miss Alice Brimson, president of the Baptist training school, gave an address on "Our Americanization Work." Mrs. Chas. E. Emery of Denver spoke on "Our State Work." The women outlined an aggressive program for the coming year.

Monday afternoon, Doctor Evans, dean of the state university law school, gave the address of welcome, reminding the delegates that the Boulder church was in peculiar sense their church since 180 Baptist students looked to it for spiritual help. Wm. H. Fowle, Trinidad, vice-president of the convention, responded in happy and appreciative vein.

The seventh annual address of President Freeman was an eloquent sermon on the greatness of Baptist history and the obligation it lays upon us today to carry out Baptist ideals. He declared that service is the greatest law of life and that workers must be trained. When Baptists are willing to take second place in education, they invite the withdrawal of the approval of God and may fear the removal of their candlestick. What we must do quickly.

The banquet Wednesday evening brought together 300 men and women. The addresses of Miss Brimson and of Dr. J. A. Curtis of India left the hearers with a desire to hear more, to do more and to give more.

"Education and Religion"

At the evening session, Doctor Norlin of the state university, speaking on "Education and Religion" said, "Many of us have a feeling that civilization may have lost its way and be approaching other dark age. No truer test of a civilization can be found than the extent to which we project ourselves into the future. The optimism of the Victorian age was blasted by the war. We now see there is no cosmic law driving us inevitably upward to perfection. Pessimism has resulted in many quarters. We are disenchanted with our civilization. In this hour education and religion are striving for the same goal, a new humanity, and working together may yet save the day. The large-minded men of education and the church stand on the same platform, saying, 'It is the truth that will make us free.'"

President Vaughn of Colorado Woman's college gave the second address of the evening. Our college, situated in the mile high city of Denver, in the only woman's college in the Rocky mountain and Pacific coast area. President Vaughn has already brought the attendance up to the largest number in many years and has created a new spirit of helpfulness.

The report of Secy. Fred E. Palmer on Thursday showed sixty-four paid workers aiding in the work of sixty fields. Six new churches have been organized in new and promising fields. Nineteen churches have been engaged in building enterprises with an outlay over $400,000. The state board has helped in seven of these, contributing $3100. During the fourteen years of Doctor Palmer's leadership, the board has never been a day late in sending out salaries, or borrowed a dollar to carry on its work. Colorado was asked to raise $96,000 last year. It raised 90 per cent of this in distributable funds and exceeded this amount in actual giving to denomination enterprises.

Dr. W. F. Ripley, director of religious education, reported two inspiring summer assemblies held in the state, one at Cedaredge for the western slope and the other at Palmer lake for the eastern part of the state. Every department of the work for Baptist schools and young people's societies showed advance. Regret was expressed by the convention at the resignation of Mrs. C. M. Philbrick, director of children's work, who becomes director of religious education for Broadway church, Denver.

The convention raised over $500 to pay hospital expenses for W. A. Goudie who was seriously injured when he saved the life of a little boy on his field.

The evangelistic program of the denomination presented by Dr. Frank E. Eden, Denver, was enthusiastically endorsed by the convention. Dr. J. A. Curtis gave the closing address on his work in India.

No recent convention has recorded greater advance, with 5000 baptisms and all departments of the work going forward aggressively. Under the leadership of Doctor Palmer, the convention faces the future with confidence. Officers elected are Joshua A. Gravett, president; E. M. Dodd and T. F. Kelley, vice-presidents; E. B. Hart, clerk; C. M. Benight, assistant clerk; and F. I. Smith, treasurer.

The next meeting will be held in the East Side church, Pueblo, with John Skein as preacher of the annual sermon and William H. Fowle, alternate.

Nebraska Baptist Convention

By R. R. Coon

THE fifty-ninth anniversary of the Nebraska Baptist Convention was held Oct. 13-17 with the First church of Omaha, A. A. De Larme, pastor. Here more than twenty years ago was held the national convention of B. Y. P. U. in the new house of worship. Now the convention found the enlarged structure with its spacious parish house well fitted for such gatherings. Both here and in the parish homes, the guests were made welcome.

Pastoral Conference

In the pastoral conference, as in the convention, the note of evangelism dominated. The question of preparing the church for evangelism was discussed by four speakers who emphasized the spirituality of the work and its preparatory organization. The veteran evangelist of the state, called upon to give testimony, spoke of the urgent need to have first a back-door revival, a cutting off of worldly and unworthy members, and gave a thrilling recital of his own experience in this line when a pastor.

Women's Meeting

"Victorious Evangelism," gained through prayer, efficiency, faith, love, knowledge and service, culminating in the golden anniversary banquet, was the key-note of the women's meetings. The stirring words of Miss Alice Brimson, president of the Chicago training school; of Mrs. Frank Miner, president of West Central district; of Mrs. E. S. Gunn, general secretary in the state; and of Mrs. R. Richards, reelected state president, were inspiring in view of the brief time in which to complete the golden jubilee offering.

Reviews of the Year

Secretary Morton stated that the numerical increase of Baptists the last year was the third largest in the history of the convention. In thirty years property holdings increased 400 per cent. While the number of churches had declined, the number of church members had increased 40 per cent.

Thirty-two missionary pastors have served thirty-one churches reporting 391 baptisms; total number of baptisms in the state, 1575. Dr. George Sutherland presented names of religious workers sent out by Grand Island college and scattered in nearly every state and in foreign lands. For the most part these received their training during his nineteen-years' presidency. Pres. Oak Davis gave a hopeful outlook for the future and an earnest word of advice to make the Bible the object of greater study and practice. Mention of the departed during the year included two names long to be remembered, Dr. J. W. Conley and I. W. Carpenter, foremost among ministers and laymen for efficiency.

Unity of Belief

One of the few good things the city dailies said in their scant notices was: "Avoiding contentious debates, the Baptists agreed to combine this year on evangelism." A resolution was unanimously voted and requested for publication in the Watchman-Examiner and THE BAPTIST as follows: "The Nebraska Baptist Convention records its unequalled belief in the inspiration and integrity of the Bible, the divine authority, supernatural character and deity of Christ, his vicarious death on the cross and his actual resurrection. We further believe in the baptism of the New Testament, the immersion of the believer in water, and that this is necessary to church membership."

Expression of endorsement of this resolution by the speakers was frequent. One of the two women on the convention program—few were more attentively heard—laid special and repeated emphasis on the need of Bible study with a thrilling appeal to make the Bible the object of study and practice.

The speech of Rev. G. Clifford Cress of THE BAPTIST was informing, partial and impersonal. He proposed that papers now existing cooperate to secure subscriptions for some denominational periodical, since such a large majority of Baptists take none at all.

Pertinent Advice

Among the good things thundered out by Dr. S. G. Neil was this: "A speaker should show three things: have something to say clearly, say it, and stop when it is said." Doctor Masee's remarks on "read" sermons, on the weakness of a personal evangelism without preaching evangelism, and on the dead formality of the same "order of service" from the beginning to the end of the year were well worth studying.

National Leaders

The convention was particularly fortunate in its outside speakers. The address of Doctor Masee, Friday evening, brought the large audience to its feet in response to the appeal to work to win souls. Drs. S. L. Roberts, A. M. Petty, P. C. Wright, S. G. Neil, John A. Curtis and Floyd Carr will long be remembered for their messages of hope and inspiration.

Officers elected for the following year were H. D. Rhoades, Omaha, president; R. B. Elrod, Lincoln, first vice-president; E. F. Jordan, Tilden, second vice-president; Mrs. Jeff Yelton, Lincoln, third vice-president; A. B. Newell, Grand Island, treasurer; Charles Firth, Grand Island, recording secretary; R. R. Coon, Grand Island, historian.

The next anniversary will be held in Hastings with A. A. De Larme of Omaha as preacher of the annual sermon.

Michigan State Convention

By J. C. AUSTIN

THE ninety-first annual meeting of the Michigan State Convention was held at Adrian, Oct. 18-21. The convention was preceded by the forty-first annual meeting of the Michigan Baptist Ministers' Conference, with Rev. Henry P. Klyver, its president, presiding. In addition to speakers from the state, Rev. W. H. Geistweit's address on "The Harnessing Power" will long be remembered. Said Dr. Geistweit, "Power was never given for felicity but for efficiency. Power is either static or dynamic." Many Christians have the former but the kingdom needs the latter.

President W. G. Spencer of Hillsdale opened the convention by calling attention to the strength of Michigan Baptists as demonstrated by man-power, 55,000 in number; organized power, nearly 500 churches; economic power as shown by the value of its properties; spiritual power, by the addition of over 3500 people by baptism within the last year to its membership. Rev. Floyd Carr of New York gave an address on "Developing the Missionary Church." Dr. Frank W. Padelford of Massachusetts quoted that the president of a large state university showed that drunkenness and dissipation in our state institutions is much less than in years before the nation went dry. Doctor Padelford's address was followed by an equally encouraging one by Dr. Frank Smith of New York. Doctor Smith spoke of "The Second Generation" and showed from many angles that the second generation is being moulded into American life in Christian citizenship. Dr. A. W. Beaven of Rochester, N. Y., in his two addresses showed himself familiar with both subjects, "Putting Your Church on the World Map" and "The Challenge of Youth to the Church of Today." In one address Doctor Beaven said, "It is criminal to take the spiritual enthusiasm awakened by a world vision and exhaust that enthusiasm on your local church. A man is either larger or smaller after he has made his gift." In the address "The Challenge of Youth to the Church of Today" Doctor Beaven scored the people who pay for large playhouses and leave their children in "cellars and holes in the ground for Sunday-school classes and pay no heed to proper facilities for religious educational purposes." Doctor Beaven said that the best denomination education is procured by reading the denominational papers. Mrs. Mary J. Bloomer, treasurer of the Woman's Home Mission Society, appealed for increased cooperation with and sacrifice for the missionary work under the woman's society.

At the laymen's banquet 231 men gathered to hear Dr. Joseph C. Robbins and Dr. Frederick A. Agar on Wednesday night; 290 women met at the women's banquet at the same hour. Music was furnished for these occasions by the girls' glee club of Hillsdale college and the ladies' quartet from Gaynor club, Calamazoo college. Thirty-one men drove from Lansing to Adrian for the banquet, covering a mileage of 5580 miles, but they were amply repaid by hearing Doctor Robbins speak of the need of the world, the universality of God's sympathy and the adequacy of Christ for the world's need; while Doctor Agar in discussing "Courage or Cowardice" sent many a pastor home determined to have the courage of his convictions in planning that every member of his church be regarded as justifying the interest and activities of the pastor. Dr. Johnston, of Chicago convinced every one here that there will be 25,000 in the Northern Baptist Convention to be held in the Coliseum next year. Dr. J. S. Kirtley, acting pastor of the Ashland Avenue church, Toledo, convincingly showed that the Baptist objective is as much in vogue today as when our forefathers pronounced it and were banished for it. The B. Y. P. U. rally at which Mr. Edwin Phelps, secretary of the B. Y. P. U. of A. and Rev. Francis Stifler of Chicago spoke, was attended by over 100 young people. The work of Executive Secretary John E. Smith was heartily commended as he reported that over 100 churches are remitting one-twelfth of their quotas each month, although some borrow the money to do so. There were 612 delegates from outside Adrian. A spirit of harmony and encouragement prevailed throughout the five session.

Kansas

By J. T. CRAWFORD

THE Baptists of Kansas held their sixty-seventh annual convention with the First church of Eldorado, M. O. Immons, pastor, Oct. 12-14. Heavy rains preceding the meeting reduced the attendance below an earlier expectation, but still there were registered approximately 450 delegates and visitors. The hospitality of the entertaining church was generous. It had just entered a new house of worship, which has a larger floor space than any other Baptist church building in the state. Its beautiful auditorium accommodated the convention adequately while the gymnasium and apartments of the educational plant made it possible to carry on all group meetings simultaneously. The State Ministers' Association met Monday evening with the annual session by Pastor J. R. Stuckey, First church, Kansas City. His theme, "Has the Church a Message for Today?" was read on Matt. 16:16, 18. The essential message of the church is the crucified Christ. It has power and meets the world's urgent needs. On Tuesday the ministers were in an interesting program. "Men's Classes" and "The Essentials of a Prosperous Church" were among the subjects of special consideration. "Moral and Mental Requirements for the Minister" by Dr. T. P. Stafford of the Kansas Baptist Seminary, and "When is Education a Sin?" by President Erdmann Smith of Ottawa, were among the outstanding messages.

The women had a varied and profitable program in their all-day session. Their keynote was "Work." They had a key verse and a slogan to fit the keyword. When the busy day closed with its addresses and conferences, they insisted that it was "the best ever."

For some years it has been the practice to have reports of the convention board and all standing committees printed in advance, stitched and ready for distribution at the annual meeting. Each delegate and visitor was presented with this leaflet of forty pages. The plan proved satisfactory. These reports are not read verbatim, but are sketched briefly with emphasis upon the vital themes.

The report of the board of directors was so arranged as to set forth the work of the seven departments. The consideration of these departmental reports constituted a vital factor of the program and continued in an orderly way through the entire convention meeting.

In the missionary department, a summary was presented showing a total of seventy-six workers. Sixty-two of these were pastors serving nearly 100 churches and out-stations in cities, county seat towns, villages and the open country. Statement was made that with but one exception, every church where aid had been given in pastoral support reported additions by baptism or otherwise. The field staff and working forces of the convention for the twelve months, covered in the report were about 76 per cent of the working forces in some former years; and the results in work done were also only about 76 per cent. This is regrettable, but reduction in income has made necessary a corresponding reduction in work attempted.

The convention program from Tuesday night to Thursday night was crowded and vital. The annual sermon was preached by Pastor W. H. Rogers, First church, Wichita. He stressed the Great Commission. With remarkable clearness and passion he appealed for revived loyalty to Jesus Christ and increased devotion to the work of carrying his message to the ends of the world. It was a stirring sermon that sounded a worthy keynote for the days that should follow.

The team furnished Kansas by the Board of Missionary Cooperation consisted of Dr. Peter C. Wright, New York City; Miss Elsie Kappen, Milwaukee; and Missionary J. C. Richardson on furlough from Burma. Because of the death of her grandmother, Miss Kappen could not be present. Her place was acceptably filled by Miss R. Grace Lewison, missionary from Jorhat, Assam. Doctor Wright was at his best. His message and conference on the M. & M. Board at the ministers' meeting were unusually illuminating. His presentation of "The Denominational Outlook" consisted of a sweeping review of achievements described as a "pageant of victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." Seldom have we listened to such a recital of sacrifice and triumphs. Missionary Richardson brought a statesman-like review of the constructive, aggressive work done by the Foreign Mission Society in Burma. His message was effective, lifting in all a new confidence regarding the permanent values of the missionary enterprise.

Dr. York A. King, of Austin, Chicago, Ill., was present throughout the convention, bringing a series of fervent messages on evangelism. His themes were "The Witnessing Church," "Church Evangelism," "A Proposed State-Wide Campaign of Evangelism," "An Illustration of Church Evangelism" with a closing special message to young people. Not in years has the convention been so lifted with evangelistic fervor. A new consecration to personal work was felt. Many returned to their home tasks feeling as if they had been attending a great revival meeting.

The educational hour set before the hearers anew the value of the growing work in the Kansas City Theological seminary with its training school. It outlined also the character and reach of Ottawa university, our Baptist college in the state, and enlisted our constituency in behalf of its present campaign for equipment and endowment. C. W. Thomas, university pastor at Kansas university, Lawrence, and W. P. Halbert, pastor at Manhattan, where the state agricultural college is located, set forth the successful plans in operation to

STATION WCOY

"THIS is station WCOY (We Count On You), broadcasting from the office of THE BAPTIST, Immanuel Bldg., Chicago.

"Tonight we shall hear from several of our friends. None is more welcome than a dear old lady in Kalispell, Mont., who writes: 'I want to write and thank you for sending me THE BAPTIST. I never knew what it was to be without a Baptist paper while I had a home and do not see now how I could get along without THE BAPTIST. Please receive my heartfelt thanks.' This woman is well past eighty. Her husband was a missionary on the frontiers of the Dakotas in early days. Her son died in the service as a missionary in Montana. Her subscription is a gift from a reader of the paper. There are hundreds of others who, like her, will never see the paper unless as a gift. Will you send in your check today for a gift-subscription to some aged soldier of the cross?

"THE BAPTIST is surely the best paper in the world for Baptist people. Our extreme modesty would not allow us to claim so much but when a man like Dr. Pierce S. Ellis, First church, Union Springs, Ala., writes that it is, what can we poor editors do but believe it? This is his deliberate judgment: 'Enclosed find check for $2.50 for renewal of THE BAPTIST, the greatest denominational paper published anywhere. It gets better all the time.' Now that is what he said. Who are we to deny it?

"These Illinois pastors believe in THE BAPTIST. They just naturally cannot keep house without it. Rev. C. W. Webb, Madison, Ill., sends in his cheerful check for $3 'for Missions and THE BAPTIST. I cannot keep my work going without them.' He knows that they are the best and most useful sort of assistant pastors a minister can have around. One Illinois pastor down state is planning to put both periodicals into his budget next year. And he is planning a new $50,000 meeting house, too. He is endowed with an unusual bump of wisdom.

To economize on denominational periodicals, even when engaged in a building campaign, is mighty poor strategy.

'Denominational literature of the highest standard of excellence is available,' says Dr. E. H. Shanks, First church, Salem, Ore. 'THE BAPTIST, the Watchman-Examiner and Missions are to be found on the reading tables of the Salem public library.' And with wholesome words in his bulletin he urges his people to put these papers into their own homes. How about the public library in your home town? Has it been supplied with subscriptions to your denominational journals? It is a fruitful method of spreading wholesome truth. Do it today? Hurry!

"EUREKA! (I have found it.) This is the state motto of California but it can be used with truth and honesty by the friends of THE BAPTIST. We made a discovery up at Huron, S. D., during the sessions of the state convention. Pres. J. M. Coon seemed to face some real difficulties. He had tried to remove a wheel from an auto by turning the nut the wrong way. It was a left-handed nut. So thoughtful friends chipped in and bought him a left-handed monkey-wrench. He carried the wrench throughout the sessions and on several occasions he unscrewed the inscrutable. The convention voted unanimously to double the list of subscriptions for THE BAPTIST. President Coon will carry the left-handed wrench with him and any community that does not come across with its quota is likely to get a vigorous twist of the wrench. Other convention secretaries please copy.

"The office boy says that in his opinion now is the time for all good men to come to the help of their denominational periodicals. He says that if eventually, why not now, seeing that THE BAPTIST and the eighteenth amendment seem to be unshaken by the mighty winds that have swirled about them?"

assist students at these state institutions. Every aspect of our educational work in the state is promising, but calls urgently for enlarged resources.

"Reaching Our Missionary Goals" was presented effectively by Alpha Ingle, secretary of promotion, with eight helpers. These brought five-minute, rapid-fire messages on "The Spirit to Win," "Team Work," "As We See It," "Plans for Coming Weeks," "Our Lord's Command," "The World's Need," "We Are Able," "Let's Do It." The financial goals of the missionary year were clearly presented and a new enthusiasm for reaching them was definitely created.

In keeping with recent enlargement of plans, an increased number of choice young people were present and took active part on the programs of the last afternoon and night. Their presence and enthusiasm gave token of fine recruits for the future.

Mr. W. C. Simons of Lawrence, one of the leading editors of the state, showed great devotion as president of the convention. He is succeeded by Hon. Frank Nighswonger of Wichita, formerly state senator and now mayor in his home city. His statement that he regarded it a higher honor to be chosen president of the Kansas Convention than to have been elected governor of the state, indicates his interest in the work.

Delightful harmony prevailed throughout all sessions.

The next convention will be held in Hutchinson where Baptist people are just completing a commodious church plant.

Illinois Baptist State Convention

By CHARLES A. CARMAN

ILLINOIS Baptists held their eighty-second annual session, said by many to be a "peak" convention in spiritual power and fervor, in the new edifice of the Mattoon church, James M. Lively, pastor. The cordiality of the church and entire community, the hearty co-operation of the local press, a carefully prepared program, and a representation of over 700 delegates from the churches, who stayed on the job from beginning to close, made this gathering stand out as one among many in the experience of convention-goers. The convention motto was "Winning Men to Christ" and furnished the theme for a consistent program.

Young People's Session

Three pre-convention sessions were held. The department of religious education conducted afternoon and evening sessions with an enthusiastic banquet of young people intervening. The relation of youth to the church, the larger forms of B. Y. P. U. organization, and the leadership of youth were discussed by Harry Shewhart, Villa Grove, Herbert Hines, Springfield, Director L. H. Koehler. At the banquet four young people discussed young people and their study life, friendships, recreational life and service activities. After a conference hour Fred Baldus brought the session to a climax in an address on "Stand Up to Life."

State Pastors' Union

At the pastoral union session in the evening the annual sermon was by F. Criminger of Mt. Vernon whose thought centered about "the kingdom of God, the reign of Jesus." After the obituary report by Pres. G. W. Taft, Secy. Jar H. Franklin of New York gave the closing address. Speaking of the new enlarged world of today with its necessity for an enlarged conception of God, he emphasized the revelation of God, Jesus and the fact that the field is the world and the need of the world is at home and abroad.

Women's Sessions

The Woman's Baptist Mission Society held afternoon and evening sessions with 275 registrations representing every association, with responses for each on the standard of efficiency. A silver anniversary banquet was held Tuesday evening. Officers elected were Mrs. W. P. Topping, Elgin, president; first vice-president, Mrs. G. M. Potter, Alton; second vice-president, Mrs. Ernest Ridgeway, Chicago; recording secretary, Mrs. E. L. Robinson, Chicago; treasurer, Mrs. F. R. C. Rich, Decatur. The reading contest awards presented by Mrs. Foreman were the loving cup of the Ottawa Association; the Topping chiele library to the Peoria Association; the board library to the Bloomington Association; the banner to the aomi church in the Springfield Association; 152 churches reported 7542 readers of 32,377 books, making 297,802 points in all. Mrs. Topping, who has been state president for fourteen years, featured in her address the twenty-five years of progress of woman's work, noting the achievements of the year in the election of Miss Brimson to head the training school, Miss Davidson as national W. W. G. secretary, Miss Bailey missionary worker among the cos-mopolitans of southern Illinois. The woman's speakers on the convention program were Mrs. G. W. Taft, who spoke on "Ways of Winning" showing the different types of approach in mission fields to the central task of evangelism; and Mrs. Edwin H. Kinney, New York, who gave effective demonstration of Americanization opportunities in the same task.

Convention Proper

In the regular sessions F. M. Dunk and L. J. Kindig alternated in directing the stirring song services, while devotional Bible messages were brought by pastors J. H. Carstens; H. Lee Mc-Donald; Harland F. Tuttle; J. M. Brinkman; A. S. Kellie; J. W. Merrill; S. D.
Kenney; F. C. Schute; W. C. Hart, and Henry Clay Miller. Pres. T. Harley challenged the church in his opening address to immediately engage the enemy in the battle of the kingdom.
Robert Van Meigs in the key-note address sounded the call to evangelism because of the sin in the world, our duty to God our Father, our gratitude for our lost condition without Christ.
Edward Babcock reminded us of the fundamental laws of the revival for which all Christians are praying. The final sermon by Ralph M. Jones of El Paso was on "The Failures of Jesus" referring to Judas and the Pharisees and contrasting them with the disciples in whom Jesus implanted the seed of the kingdom of God. Ralph A. Jensen of Chicago brought out that Jesus never defied crowds, but preached to the individual in the crowd, appealing to the best in man with a compassionate word of love. The opportunity of Baptists to render real Christian service through their hospitals was the message of B. A. Wilkes of St. Louis. York stated that the "witnessing church" is the intention of Jesus, the prerequisite and normal expression of evangelism. A. W. Beaven of Rochester, forcefully depicted the church as the center of a local circle and a world circle and the demand of evangelism that it can be saved both for himself and for the world. It's not an "either-or" but a "both-and." Alonzo M. brought out of his wide experience told of opportunities and success in winning the American Indians.

One of the fascinating parts of the program came in the brief but touching personal messages from the workers among the foreign-speaking people in the state. It is impossible to reproduce the realistic human touches of these stories of Mexican, Lithuanian, Roumanian, Hungarian, Bohemian, Pole, Russian, Jew, Slovak, Chinese, German and Swede.

Charles A. Garman spoke Wednesday evening on the "Evangelism of Youth," followed by Secy. F. W. Padelford, New York, in a masterful address on "Evangelism and Education" which are inseparable and have been throughout the history of the Christian church. He paid a fine tribute to our youth in colleges today and issued a call to the church to stand by the Christian college in this, a most critical time. L. K. Williams of Chicago, president of the National Baptist Convention (negro), was heard with interest as he told of the growing work of that body. G. A. Huntley, M. D., gave two splendid addresses on "Christ in the Out-of-the-Way Places of the World" which gave a birds-eye view of the ten mission fields of our denomination.

Here, There and Everywhere

REAL ROTARIANS are the men of Auburn-dale church, Springfield, Mass. They

On Sundays they study "Christianity and Present Day Issues".

A "BIG FALL MEET" at First church, Red Bank, N. J., brought together 200 members and friends Oct. 7. With enthusiasm, fellowship, refreshments and whatever goes into the best kind of a time,

A. E. Peterson, state superintendent, in his report made an interesting comparison of the years 1919 and 1925. Membership grew from 86,748 to 88,228; current expense items, from $872,272 to $2,033,551; baptisms, from 2873 to 4564; total gifts, from $1,254,678 to $2,412,549;
but benevolence giving slumped from $382,405 to $378,998 in 1925, although in 1921 it had reached $612,860. A large proportion of the increase in home expenses is for new buildings, but it is evident that we need to give added support to the world-wide cause of missions.
Evangelism is the center of this year's program in the state.

T. Harley Marsh was reelected president of the convention, and Murphysboro chosen as the next place of meeting with a goal of 1000 delegates in attendance. James M. Lively was elected president of the pastoral union and Eugene Trowbridge of Springfield, president of the Baptist Young People's Union of Illinois.

Notes on the Lesson for November 14

CALEB'S FAITHFULNESS REWARDED

Lesson Text: Josh. 14:6-15
Golden Text: Josh. 14:8

Caleb and Joshua had a good deal in common. They were marked by the same spirit of courage and faith, and enriched by a common experience. More than forty years before in the face of an overwhelming majority they stood their ground and boldly proclaimed their conviction that the hope and opportunity had arrived for the Israelites to enter Canaan. At this time they were both old men and Caleb was about to claim his reward so long deferred.

Promises Unrealized

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews in the New Testament gives expression to a significant word when he says, "These all died not having received the promise." They lived by faith looking forward to the realization of the messianic hope which they cherished. Joshua and Caleb were in this hopeful company for forty-five years. The hope of entering the promised land was deferred for more than a generation but their hearts never grew sick. Faith in the ultimate triumph of their original idea never waned. They both believed that they would live to see their faith rewarded, and it was this faith that made them leaders among their people. As we write, the newspapers are telling of the funeral of Eugene Debs and one of the papers has this poetic phrase, "Eugene Debs has found the brotherhood of man for which he lived and served." But, of course, he found the brotherhood of death where all distinctions of race and class are at an end. His hope was never realized in this life. He was one of the great company of idealists who live ahead of their age and never realize their promise. He was more of a poet than a politician, more of an idealist than an economist. Like Caleb he urged an immediate conquest when as yet the people whom he urged were wholly unfit for the Utopia which he pictured with such rare eloquence.

Years Defied

Eighty-five and still claiming honor of conquest is a fine comment on the undying courage of Caleb. He wanted no soft place already prepared. "Give me this hill country," said he, "I still longed to make good his faith being able to drive the giants out of their fortifications. Forty-five years before he had said, "Let us go up and possess it for we are well able to overcome it," and he had not changed his mind on that point. It is inspiring to see a man refusing to allow old age to dominate his mind and heart. "I am eighty-five," said Caleb, "but I am as strong as the day that Moses sent me to spy out the land. Allowing, of course, for the optimism in such words we are still compelled to admit that whatever may have been the actual physical condition of Caleb, his heart was all right. True faith never grows old and never dies.

A Service for Christmas

Joyful Voices

This service presents the Christmas Story in a most attractive manner. Six tableaux are provided for in the Pageant, but are not necessary if merely a service of song and recitation is desired, though they add greatly to the attractive features and are easily prepared. The music is most charming, though not difficult.

YOUTH IN THE MINISTRY and THE BAPTIST

Some time ago The Baptist decided to find out what type of sermons were being preached by the young men in our pulpits. Therefore the presidents and deans of our colleges, seminaries and Bible institutes were requested to nominate men who had received their training in these schools and who had not been in the ministry more than ten years. Each of the nominees was asked to furnish a sermon for publication in THE BAPTIST.

YOUTH READILY RESPONDS

The response was prompt and gracious. More than two score of the young men in Baptist pulpits within the area of the Northern Convention have sent in sermon manuscripts or have promised to do so.

REPRESENTATIVE SERMONS

The sermons preached by these young men are samples of what the pews get every Sunday. No special sermon has been fixed up for publication in The Baptist. Each manuscript stands for a sermon preached recently. All types of schools are represented by the preachers and all kinds of ministers are among the nominees.

Now Is the Time to Subscribe

The publication of this special series of sermons by young Baptist preachers will begin in THE BAPTIST of December 4.

The sermons will run concurrently with

THE WORLD PULPIT

The high quality of THE BAPTIST will be maintained with feature articles by Bernard Clausen and H. Campbell-Duncan, with all the regular departments of the paper enriched, with special numbers including The World Survey Number and The Education Number appearing in due time, and with all the issues of January giving special emphasis and space to the aerial world tour.

Annual Subscription $2.50, Church Clubs $2.00, With Missions $3.00

AMERICAN TEACHERS OF CONSTANTINOPLE COLLEGES VISITING THE WALLS OF STAMBOUL, STORMED AND TAKEN BY THE TURKS IN 1453

Folks, Facts and Opinion

The American Legion in its campaign against the slacker at the ballot box is beginning to work towards the foundations of the evil. It is arranging meetings for study and discussion of such topics as "Direct Nomination vs. the Convention System"; "Party Government vs. Independent Voting"; "The Short Ballot"; and "Obstacles Besetting Voters".

Japan may get a new angle of view upon the American exclusion policy. Korean coolies are said to be crowding into Japan. They can live more cheaply than Japanese laborers, will work for lower wages and are crowding the latter out of employment. What to do about the matter is puzzling the Japanese government, for Korea belongs to Japan. Thus the man at the bottom always crowds into a seat at the table.

For the first time in its history the executive committee of the Federal Council of Churches will hold its annual meeting this year in the West. The meeting will be held in Minneapolis, Dec. 8-10. The agenda will deal with major questions of policy now confronting the Federal Council. One of the interesting personalities will be Miss Lucy who was the organizing genius of the British Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship.

Parks, fountains and trees to take the place of the slum tenements in New York City, are in the vision of August Heckscher, a wealthy philanthropist. He proposes that he and other wealthy citizens contribute $50,000,000 a year, and the city an equal sum to be spent within a period of five years to realize his vision. If he lives long enough, he will see the thing done. Civilization has almost reached the point where slum dwellings will not be permitted to exist in a self-respecting community.

Why should the back page of so many church calendars be filled with stereotyped matter consisting of long lists of officers and committees? It seems like a waste of good space that might be used profitably for current items of news or a fresh message from the minister each Sunday. P. H. McDowell, pastor at Glen Falls, N. Y., utilizes the back page of his church bulletin for tabloid sayings which carry a "punch." In a recent number of the bulletin an open letter from the pastor appears. It is headed "More Appreciation than Instruction," and is aimed at a better brand of ushering. Without offense the pastor makes some telling remarks about ushering which all church ushers might read with profit. Ushers well-groomed, prompt, cheerful, courteous and reverent are appreciated, but they are urged to seat the people.

Slavery and the slave trade are at last headed for extinction if a new convention of the League of Nations is carried into effect. It proposes the definite outlawry of both practices, and binds the member nations to the abolition of slavery and to the suppression of the slave trade.

Baptist leaders in Great Britain are concerned about an apparent decline in the religious life of their people. Pres. J. H. Rushbrooke and Secy. M. E. Aubrey of the Baptist Union have issued a message to the churches in which they say that for years the total church membership has almost ceased to grow, that the Sunday-school enrolment has fallen off by 3000 and that 80 per cent of the scholars do not confess Christ in baptism. They plan to hold conferences in the churches to consider the state of religion.

The Baptist Bible Union of North America, of which Rev. T. T. Shields of Toronto is president, Rev. W. B. Riley of Minneapolis, vice-president for the Northern Convention territory and Rev. J. Frank Norris of Dallas vice-president for the Southern Convention territory, has called Rev. W. E. Atkinson of Toronto to be field secretary for the organization. Mr. Atkinson spent four years as a missionary in Africa and has a wide acquaintance in the United States and Canada. "Much of his time will be spent in bringing Bible Unionists together in unorganized territories and in arranging conferences to be addressed by local speakers."

Henry Ford's five-day week has cordial support of the Jewish Daily Bulletin, which says that the Jewish Sabbath Alliance has advocated such a week some time. It notes also that the Croley Shipbuilding Co. has introduced the five-day week in its yards at Oakland, Calif.

Make smokeless powder feed people rather than kill them, seems to be an appropriate slogan. The government has on hand three million pounds of smokeless powder which, because of change in guns, has become obsolete. It proposes to sell this powder for use as fertilizer. The high nitrogen content of the powder makes it valuable for such use.

One of the most serviceable little things that has been done lately is the publication of a pamphlet of thirty-two pages by Samuel S. Wyer on "Science, Evolution, Religion and the Bible." It has an introduction by William Thompson, president emeritus of Ohio State university and moderator of the Presbyterian General Assembly of United States. The purpose of the pamphlet is to give a series of classified quotations from recognized authorities so selected and arranged as to facilitate clear definition. For an understanding of the current disputes about these subjects it is better than a library.

That remarkable interpreter of the current movement in China, the Chinese Recorder, in an electrifying editorial in the September number, calls for a new creative conception of missions. At the heart of its plea is this declaration of tremendous import: "Now the Great Commission must become the pan-Christian task of salvaging all civilizations, if civilizations can or should be salvaged. all civilizations now stand at the bar of an alert humanity. Once western Christians pointed to their civilizations as the crown of Christian effort. Now that the Oriental is burning them full of holes with acid criticism, it is becoming customary for western Christians to disavow so-called 'Christian' civilizations. The change is in the Christians, not in the civilizations. Western Christians have given generously of their knowledge, means and life to Oriental peoples. In addition to hearing western civilizations discounted, the western Christian hears with amazement the criticism of the chalice of religious and philanthropic blessings he offers is bitter with non-Christian ingredients. And hearing that the Oriental thinks about them, many western Christians hardly know what to think about themselves. There seems to be only one thing to do. They must begin over again."

It seems probable that a general disarmament conference will be called for an early date in the year 1927 under the auspices of the League of Nations. It is announced that the program for such a conference will be ready by the first of the year.

A Pennsylvania court decision may have important bearing upon the opening of the sesquicentennial exposition on Sunday. It is reported that Judge Wm. M. Hargest of the Dauphin county court ruled, Sept. 16, that the opening is contrary to law, that it is punishable under the criminal code and that it is also subject to quo warranto proceedings. But the "sesqui" seems still to be running on Sunday.

Creditable mention is due to the foreign mission board of the National Baptist Convention (negro), for the high quality of the Mission Herald, the official magazine published by the convention in the interests of foreign missions.
Print, paper and pictures are good.
The survey of the field of news is comprehensive and judicious. The editorials are well conceived. It is interesting to note that the missionary receipts reported in the Herald for August amounted to a little more than $3000.

Shall poison gas be used hereafter in war? The question is coming up for settlement through a protocol, drafted at Geneva more than a year ago and now awaiting ratification by the senate of the United States. The Association of Military Surgeons, having about 3500 members, has passed resolutions declaring the use of gas a comparatively humane method of warfare. So also have the Military Order of the World War and the American Legion. But the departments of state, of war and of the navy in Washington are definitely opposed to the use of gas as being inhumane and barbarous.

All the way from Jaro, Iloilo, Philippines, comes this interesting clipping from the Extension Magazine of Chicago:
"Philippine Catholics are wrought up generally because of the Protestant pros-elytizing activities of the Silliman institute, Dumaguete, P. I. Evidently the institute is well named. . . . American printed tracts of lies are distributed to the pupils as a matter of routine. . . .
This situation brings out a peculiarity of Protestant missionary work in the Philippines, namely, that it is confined entirely to efforts to lead Catholic youth away from their traditional faith." And Fred Holman, a trustee of the Carnegie Foundation for international peace, is quoted in these words: "The Roman Catholic countries are naturally resentful of attempts by Protestant churches to convert their communicants. It would be better if we brought back all these missionaries." The remedy would seem to be either to drive out those missionaries by law or other form of coercion (a method not unknown to Catholics), or to outdo them in the winsomeness of the Christian gospel. Whenever the church gets into a position in which people must choose between it and Christ, it is in trouble.

Resentment in Japan over the exclusion law is not diminishing. The Japan mission of the M. E. church is authority for this statement. And in a series of resolutions given out in July it declares that the continuance of such resentment is due not to any organized efforts of agitation either for or against exclusion, but to a sense of the inherent unfairness of the law. The resolutions recommend "such amendment of our naturalization law as will open American citizenship, under the safeguard of high qualifications, without national or racial discrimination."

At Helsingfors, Finland, the Y. M. C.
A. has raised more problems than it has solved. The occasion was the nineteenth world conference of the organization, held last August. What shall be the attitude of the Y. M. C. A. toward the churches, toward the national movements in such countries as India and China, toward the radical movements in many countries? How shall its program be adapted to the great variety of conditions under which its work is to be done in all parts of the world? Under what conditions and how far shall it function as a church, as, for instance, in administering the communion at its meetings?
What shall be the relative emphasis placed by it upon the activities of evangelism, education and social ministry?
What shall be its relation to similar societies organized in some countries under the auspices of other than the Christian religion? With what understanding of the psychology of youth at the present time shall it build its program of approach? These are only a few of the questions raised at Helsingfors for solution of which the Y. M. C. A. will require all of the resources of leadership it can command.

If anything could exceed in pathos the story of retrenchment and privation on the part of missionaries told by the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, it is that of the foreign mission board of the Southern Baptist Convention. Receipts, amounting in the year 1921 to more than $2,500,000, fell to less than $1,500,000 in the last year. And the board has outstanding obligations amounting to more than $1,700,000. Missionaries are returning to the board twenty-two and two-thirds cents on every dollar of their salaries to apply on the debt. And if the appeal of the board to the missionaries on the field does not bring tears to one's eyes, what will? Read it: "We gratefully and warmly appreciate the heroic and un-complaining way in which these missionaries and beloved brethren in other lands have, for four years, taken disappointment at retrenchment and have striven to cooperate with the board in its misfortune; we admonish them all to do their best to hold the lines which have been broken by death and weakened by reduced appropriations; we shall do our utmost to persuade southern Baptists to come to their relief, and, as soon as our resources make it possible for us to do so, we shall lift some of the burden of their distress."

Infant baptism by immersion as practiced by the Greek Orthodox church is described by Rev. J. M. Rife in the United Presbyterian as he actually witnessed it. If his dramatization is true to life, it is not surprising that if one must administer something called baptism to infants, he should prefer sprinkling.

The general impression that white women in the South are in constant peril from black men is challenged by Mrs.
Carrie Bartlett, who used to share that impression, but who, from long experience in the South finds that neither she nor other southern women of her acquaintance find occasion for it. She says significantly, "It seems to me that it is the colored, not the white, women of the South for whose safety we should be concerned," because of immoral white men.

Chicago Baptists have maintained a social union fifty years, that is, they are making preparations for the observance in February of its semi-centennial celebration. The first banquet of the season was held in the LaSalle hotel, Nov. 2, with Dr. J. C. Massee as the speaker. More than fifty new members were adopted. The attendance was about 450. Doctor Massee's address was in line with his evangelistic campaign across the continent.

Tithing is one thing. Many have found it a good thing. The cult of tithing is another and different thing. One of the leading religious papers argues that religion today has largely lost its old adventurous faith and its great mystical experiences and that tithing brings back those lost values, the radiance, the faith, the courage and the mystical discovery of God which belonged to the great saints and revivalists of the past. Doubtless if conscientiously done tithing exhibits spiritual values. But so does any act of devotion to God. Arguments for tithing may be drawn from many sources, but the urge for it comes from the treasury of the church.

The J. C. Massee meetings in Chicago were manifestly wholesome, evangelistic, stimulating and unifying. Doctor Massee spoke at the Baptist Social Union, at the Northern Baptist Theological seminary, and at an afternoon conference and an evening mass meeting at the Immanuel building. His reception was most cordial at all of these meetings; especially in the closing mass meeting he was in the best of his moods for a happy, passionate and flaming appeal.

Rev. T. W. Goodspeed, D.D., former pastor in Chicago and later a teacher in the Chicago Baptist Theological seminary and in the University of Chicago, has been for sixty-seven years one of the Baptist builders of Chicago. His memory is still crystal clear. At a recent meeting of the T club, composed of prominent ministers of Chicago and vicinity, he entertained the club with reminiscences of early Baptist history in Chicago. The members found the story so interesting that they voted to invite him to continue it at the next meeting.

Two hundred business and professional men, with some ministers, recently met in Chicago to consider evangelism. They discussed not theology but personal experiences. They closed with an appointed common purpose "to seek to share with others as individuals their experience with Jesus Christ; to call together pastors and laymen in their local communities and ask what they propose to do about the question of evangelism; reproduce whenever possible their own experiences through such means as 'united witnessing' campaigns."

A pleasing variation in convention programs was introduced in Indiana last year. Instead of the usual "devotional service" at the opening of every session operated as a sort of spiritual pulchritude to keep the early arrivals breathing, the crowd assembles for business, carefully prepared liturgical order of worship built as a connected series and utilizing the best of the church hymns, was conducted with a different leader for every service. And instead of using the service to cover the tardy assembling of the people, doors were closed at the opening of service, and for the half-hour of worship nobody was admitted. The services were remarkably impressive and helpful.

Preach Christ

THE range of preaching is as wide as the universe, but the focus of preaching must be confined within the limited circle of human need and the provision of the gospel to meet that need. When ministers are so often exhorted to preach Christ, it is probably the focus of the sermon which the exhorter has in mind and not the range of preaching. So many good phrases become shibboleths that it is necessary at times to rescue them from the slavish service they are forced to perform. "Preach Christ" is one of the shibboleths current among evangelicals, and especially among the good people who stress evangelism as the exclusive mission of the churches. We fully agree with all who emphasize evangelism as the primary and permanent work of Christians as individuals or as members of the institution called the church of Christ. Moreover, we heartily join with those who insist that "preaching Christ" is paramount in the ministry of evangelism. But we must be permitted to explain what we mean by this pregnant phrase.

In the first place, preaching Christ is infinitely greater than any phraseology in which the preaching may be clothed. Some people are so enslaved by certain words sacred to them that sermons, however evangelical, which do not speak these words are painfully disappointing. Some of the younger preachers in our pulpits speak a language in their sermons which is an unknown tongue to many of the earnest Christian people in the pews. For instance, the phrase "spiritual reality," so often heard these days in sermons, means nothing to many people who have been used to something more concrete. We heard a sermon some time ago which did not once mention the cross, and yet the various love and suffering and service of the cross of Christ were woven into the very texture of the message. At we wondered as we listened if a goodly number of the hearers would not be pained by the omission. This is the situation which every preacher has to meet, and the copy is the man who meets it more than half-way by taking in the words which have become a universal language among evangelical, Bible Christians. But, of course, we must always remember that "preaching Christ" is not confined to words that have become sacred because of their scriptural and doctrinal setting.

The first preaching with Christ as the theme was heard at Pentecost. A casual study of that event will reveal the fact that the Christ, central in the sermon of Peter, was the Messiah whom the Jews had long expected. He was strictly a Jewish Messiah. And the awful indictment of the sermon which went to the hearts of 3000 penitents was that they had murdered their own Messiah. That was "preaching Christ." But when Paul eclipsed Peter as the incomparable preacher of the apostolic church, the gospel had to meet Greek culture and Roman jurisprudence, and the simple rabbinical ideas of the Messiah with which provincial Jews were acquainted had to be enriched with a new content and new words. This explains the prologue of John's Gospel and the legal phraseology of Paul's letter to the Romans. But both John and Paul preached Christ, even if they had to depart from the standards of Peter. So on down through the history of preaching we find the sermons colored with the peculiar tints of the atmosphere and landscape of the times. Sometimes it is the Christ of theology, again it is the Christ of sacrament, and still again it is the Christ of the reformers or the Christ of the Puritans. But all tried to preach Christ as they saw him or as he was conceived by the particular age which embodied him in sculpture, architecture, painting, literature and music.

We are the heirs of all the preaching preceding us. And because we are heirs of such a rich inheritance, our temptation is to rest in our inheritance and guard it with such jealous care as shall prevent us from making our own contribution to the wealth of gospel preaching which has grown with the slow progress of the Christian era. The Christ of the first century A.D. as he was preached by the men who knew him best, was necessarily adapted to the conditions of the first century. But the Christ of the twentieth century is no less adaptable to the conditions of the twentieth century. This does not mean that Christ changes, for he is the same yesterday, today and forever, but it means that our conception of him changes with the increase of knowledge and experience. For instance, the cosmic Christ, revealed in part in Paul's letters to the Ephesians and Colossians, is an infinitely greater cosmic Christ to us because the universe is known today as it was never known before in the history of the world.

But amidst all the changes that mark the preaching of Christ by his ministers who have exalted him throughout the Christian era, there are certain marks which have never been effaced. Christ as the sole redeemer of men and as the perfect example for his followers has always been preached. The need of redemption from sin and death and the cry for guidance in the way of life never change. And because these basic needs haunt every generation, the Christ who alone can meet and supply these needs is the Christ of every generation. However presented, in doctrine, in liturgy, in rites, in song, in pageantry, in art, by Catholic and by Protestant, Jesus as Saviour and as Lord is the outstanding figure in the thrilling story of Christianity from its dawn in Bethlehem to the present hour. No man really preaches Christ who fails to appreciate the hunger of the human heart for something which the world does not offer, the longing for the sense of forgiveness which comes with an awakened conscience, the eagerness for some certainty of a life beyond the grave, the inarticulate desire for the daily spiritual help which only a personal experience of the power of prayer can bring, and the yearning idealism which seeks expression in bringing all the institutions of society into harmony with the principles of the kingdom of God. But with a sincere appreciation of these things in his heart, with a real acquaintance with the Lord Jesus in his experience, with a deep sense of the eternal value of the cross in his soul, and with an abounding faith in the gospel as the power of God unto salvation, any man is qualified to preach Christ in his own way.

Tackling the Modern City

BUT a few years ago it was thought by most people that Baptist organization and culture were adapted specially to the rural community. Many seriously doubted whether the denomination would ever be able to adjust itself to the conditions of the modern city so as to function effectively in cities. Our philosophy had been largely that of individualism and separateness and our whole denominational psychology seemed to be set to that type of thinking. There was even a question whether we could produce a type of leadership capable of an intelligent approach to the religious problem of the city and of forming and putting into effect an adequate urban program. Finally, even if leaders could be found, our separatism seemed to delay such a measure of cooperation as might be required for an effective city program for Baptists.

Time has tried us. We have met in actual experience the conditions of city life. We have not hesitated to take up the problem of adjusting our denominational machinery to those conditions. We have not failed. We have made the important discovery that our fluid polity, under the stress of necessity and with sufficient motivation, is not only flexible enough to fit into the new conditions but is also tenacious enough to hold us together cooperatively in spite of the novelty, variety and difficulty of those conditions. Is a ministry needed for a variety of races and languages? We are ministering to a score of races in the same city. Is an administrative agency with executive powers required? We have created such agencies in a number of the largest cities and they are in smooth and efficient operation at the present time. Are community establishments needed among foreign and industrial populations? We have founded and conducted such establishments with distinguished success. Are the Baptist people willing to accept the city as a new field of missionary endeavor and eager to contribute for the support of city missions? In few denominational enterprises have there manifested greater willingness and enthusiasm.

Our denominational experiment in ministering to the city has progressed to the point of producing a distinctive literature of unusual interpretative and directive value. It is only four or five years since Samuel Zane Batten gave to the public his stirring book, "Building a Community." But that was the message of a prophet rather than of a social engineer. It left the reader feeling the necessity for a ministry to the modern urban community, but wondering how the thing was to be done. It paved the way for a classic study of the whole subject which has now appeared in a book edited by Charles H. Sears and recently issued by the Judson Press with the practical title, "Baptist City Planning."

This book is of statesmanlike conception. It is "the outcome of a study undertaken by a committee of 150 Baptists—representatives of national, state and city home mission organizations as well as pastors and laymen in the churches." The method was that of collaboration. Subcommittees prosecuted specific lines of research. Then the "presented their findings at a general conference of the whole group" so that the results presented were subject to general review and amendment. The result is a manual which covers the field of ascertained fact concerning the subject, assembles the net values of collective experience in city work and presents a matured statement of associated findings.
